SKÁLD, n., pl. skáld; the word is in poetry rhymed as skald (with short vowel), skald and kálða, aldri and skaldi, Kormak, and so on; at the plural is always spelt skáld, not sköld; the mod. Dan. skjald is borrowed from the Icel.: [the etymology and origin of this word is untested; Prof. Bergmann, in Message de Skirnir, Strasburg, 1871, 54, derives it from the Slavonic skladi = composition, skladacz = compositor; but the earliest usages point to a Teutonic and a different et. In the ancient law skáldskapr meant a libel in verse, and was synonymous with flint, danz, nið, q. v.; the comps skáld-fífl, leir-skáld (q. v.) also point to the bad sense as the original one, which is still noticeable in popular Icel. usages and phrases such as skálda (the verb), skáldi, skáldinn (libellous), see also skáldnær below. On the other hand, skálda, Germ. schalte, means a pole (see skálda, skáld-stöng below); leis and imprecations were in the ancient heathen age scratched on wood, see the remarks s. v. nið, niðstöng. The word is therefore, we believe, to be traced back to the old libel-pole, 'scald-pole;' if so, Engl. scald = to abuse, Germ. schelten, may be kindred words; the old Lat. phrase (of Mart. Capella) barbara fraxineis sculpturæ ruua tabellis may refer to this scratching of imprecations on pieces of wood.]

COMPS: skálda-gemlur, f. pl., see Ísl. þjóðs. ii. 557-skálda-spillir, m. 'skald-spiller,' the nickname of the poet Eyvind; the name was, we believe, a bye-word, a 'poetaster,' 'plagiarist,' we believe that this nickname was given to this poet because two of his chief poems were modelled after other works of contemporary poets, the Húleygja-tal after the Ynglinga-tal, and the Hákonar-mál after the Eiríks-mál; (as to the latter poem this is even expressly stated in Fagrsk. 22); the word would thus be the same as ill-skálda, a word applied to a poet for having borrowed the refrain of his poem, Fms. iii. 65. Skálda-tal, n. a List of Poets, a short treatise affixed to the Cod. Ups. of the Edda and the Cod. Acad. primus of the Heimskringla.

II. Skálda, a contr. form of Skáldskapar-mál (List of Authors C. I), but usually applied to the old collection of Philological Treatises affixed to the Edda, (List of Authors H. I) skálda, að, to make verses, but in rather a bad sense.

skálda, að, [cp. Engl. scall or scald], to rot, fall off, of hair; skáldaðr.

skáld-eik, f. [Germ. schalt-eiche], theholm-oak, ilex, þd. (the MS. has skál-eik).

skáld-kona, u, f. a 'skald-quean,' a poetess, a nickname of a woman, for which the reason given is this; hann átti þórhildi skáldkonu, 'hón var orðgífur mikit ok fór með flimtan,' she was a 'word-witch,' and made libels, Nj. 49.

'scaldship,' poetry: I. a libel in verse; eigi skáld lýsa legorðs-sök um skáldskap, Grág. i. 351; ef maðr kvæðr skáldskap til háðungar manni, . . . ok varðar þat skóggang, skal sækja sem annan skáldskap, ii. 151, see the whole chapter in Kb. ch. 238, inscribed, um Skáldskap, of Libels; the word is therefore used synonymously with danz and flimt, nið, q. v.

II. poetry in a good sense, Edda passim; Sigvatr var ekki hrað-mæltr maðr í sundr-lausum orðum, en s. var honum svá tiltækr, at hann kvæð af tungu fram svá sem hann mælti annat mál, Ó. Skáldskapr in old writers refers to the 'form' (metre, flow, diction), not to the contents; even in such phrases as, ekki var mikill skáldskapr í því kvæði, there was not much 'scaldship' in that poem, it was a bad composition, Fms. vii. 38.

B. Remarks on the shield.—A shield was raised as a signal in time of war; a red shield betokened war (rauðr skjöldr, her-skjöldr), a white shield peace (hvitr skjöldr, fríðar-skjöldr, a peace-shield); in a battle the red shield was hoisted, Hkv. i. 33; but, bregða upp fríðr skildi, to hoist the (white) shield of peace, was a sign that the battle was to cease; hann lét skjótta upp skildi hvítum, Fagrsk. 61, Fms. vii. 23; hence also the phrase, bera herskjöld, or fara herskildi, to barry, overrun a land with the 'war shield,' see fríðr-skjöldr and her-skjöldr (s. v. herri). War ships were lined from stem to stern with a wall of shields,—skip skarar skjöldum, or skjaldat skip; hann kom í Bjarnar-fjörð með al-skjöldudu skipi, síðan var hann Skjaldar-Björn kallaðr, Landn. 156. The halls of the ancients were hung all round with a row of shields, Gm. 9, Edda 2, Eg. 43, see the curious story in Fas. iii. 42. For the shield-wall in battles see skjald-borg. Ancient sayings; nú er skarð fyrir skildi, now there is a gap for a shield, a breach in the fence, of a heavy loss, such as the death of a person, nú er skarð fyrir skildi, nú er svavrin nær á Tjörn, Jón Þorl.; höggva skarð í skildi e-s, to cut a notch in one's shield, inflict a severe blow, Orkn. (in a verse). Shields were furnished with a painted or carved 'ring' representing mythological or heroic subjects; these rings are the earliest works of Northern art on record, hence come the names rit, baugr, rönd, of which rit points to scratching (whereas Bragi used 'fá' = to paint); rauðum skildi, rönd var ór gulli, Hkv. i. 33. Such shields were a lordly gift, and gave rise to several ancient poems treating of the subjects carved or painted on the shield, such as the famous Haust-löng by Thiodolf, the Ragnars-kviða by Bragi, the two Beru-drápur (Shield-songs) by Egill; these 'shield-lays' were afterwards the sources of the writer of the Edda, but only a few fragments are preserved; (cp. the Greek lay on 'the shield of Hercules,' and the lay on Achilles' shield in the Iliad).

Skjöldungar, m. pl. the famous lineage of the kings of Denmark, from Skjöld, the son of Odin, Edda, Yngl. S. The Danish legend derives the name from his being found in infancy in a bed of reeds to which he had floated on a shield; but in fact the name is derived from the ancient Teutonic custom of electing the king by lifting him on a shield in the assembly. The word is no doubt borrowed from the Latin, for as the old Northmen and Teutons had no towns, they had no streets; it is therefore strange to find such a word in an old poem like Hóm. 13, (the passage is prob. corrupt); so also, einn dag var þat er Kormakr gékk um stræti, Korm. 228, referring to the middle of the 10th century; but as the Sa is of the 12th, the words may perhaps here too be taken as an anachronism; Ólafir konungr gékk einu dag úti á stræti, Fs. 115, referring to áðarós of the year 990; since in the 11th, and esp. in the 12th and 13th centuries, the word becomes freq. in Sagas referring to Norway, but never to Icel., Fms. vi. 363, vii. 39, Blas. 40. In the old Norse market-towns of the 11th, 12th, and following centuries, the 'street' ran along the shore (bryggjur), with 'scores' or cross lanes (veitur or almenningar) leading up to the houses (garðar), N. SUMAR, n., dat. sumri; pl. sumur; sumra, sunnum; in the old language this word was masculine in the form sumarr, of which gender a trace may still be seen in the contracted forms sumri, sumra, sunnum, for a genuine neuter does not admit these contractions. But there remains a single instance of the actual use of the masculine in the rhyme of a verse of the beginning of the 11th century, sumar hvern frekum eru, Skálda,—from which one might infer that at that time the word was still masc.; if so, it is not likely that in a poem so old as the Vsp. it would be neuter, and 'sumur' in 'of sumur eptir' perhaps ought to be corrected 'sumra' or 'sumar' (acc. sing.); as also 'varmt sumar' should be 'varmr sumarr', Vpm. 26: [A. S. sumar; a word common to all Teut. languages; in the Orm. sumerr, denoting a long u; the mod. Dan., Germ., and Engl. have sommer, summer, with a double m]:—a summer, passim. II. mythical, Sumarr, the son of Svásad, Edda 13.

B. CHRONOLOGICAL REMARKS.—The old Northmen, like the Icel. of the present time, divided the year into two halves, summer and winter; the summer began on the Thursday next before the 16th of April in the old calendar, which answers to the 26th of the Gregorian calendar (used in Icel. since A. D. 1700). The Northern and Icelandic summer is therefore a fixed term in the calendar, and consists of 184 days, viz. six months of thirty days, plus four days, called aukanætr ('eke-nights'). Summer is divided into two halves, each of three months (=ninety days), before and after midsummer (mid-sumar); and the four 'eke-nights' are every summer intercalated immediately before midsummer; thus in the Icel. Almanack of 1872—Sumar-dagr fyrsti, or the first summer-day, falls on Thursday the 25th of April; Auka-nætr from the 24th to the 27th of July; Mið-summer on the 28th of July; Sumar-dagr síðasti, or the last day of summer, on the 25th of October; cp. sumarnátt síðasta, Gisl. 67. In mod. usage the time from April to October is counted by the summer weeks, the first, second, . . . twentieth . . . week of the summer, and in Icel. Almanacks every Thursday during summer is marked by the running number of the week. The ancients, too, counted the summer by weeks, but only down to midsummer, thus, tíu vikur skulu vera af sumri er menn koma til alþingis, K. þ. K. 166; but in the latter part of the summer they counted either by the weeks from midsummer or by the weeks still left of the summer, thus, hálfum mánaði eptir mitt sumar, Nj. 4; er átta vikur lífa sumars, Grág. i. 122; frá miðju sumri til vetrar, 147; er átta vikur eru til vetrar, Nj. 192; er tveir mánaðir vóru til vetrar, 195; líðr á sumarit til átta vikna, 93; ellipt., var Rútr heima til sex vikna (viz. sumars), 10.

C. COMPS: sumar-auki, a, m. 'summer-eke, the intercalary week, an Icel. calendar-term; the ancient heathen year consisted of 364 days, or twelve months of thirty days each, plus four days, which were the auka-nætr or 'eke-nights' (see above); the remaining day and a fraction was gathered up into an intercalary week, called 'Summer-eke' or 'Eke-week,' which in ancient times was inserted every sixth or seventh year at the end of summer, which in such years was 191 days long; the 'Summer-eke' was introduced by Thorstein Surt (Thorstein the Wise) in the middle of the 10th century, see Ib. ch. 4, and is still observed in Icel.; now that the Gregorian style is in use in Icel. the intercalary week is inserted every fifth or sixth year; thus the year 1872 is marked as the 'first year after sumarauki,' (the years 1860, 1866, and 1871 being years 'with sumarauki'); 1872 sem er 'fyrsta ár eptir Sumarauka,' Icel. Almanack, 1872; the years 1864 and 1870 were 'fjórða ár eptir sumarauka'; thus in 1871 the summer had twenty-seven weeks, the eke-week being the 21st to the 27th of October. sumar-ávöxtr, m. the summer produce, Fms. x. 337. sumar-björg, f. support during the summer, Sturl. i. 136. sumar-bók, f. a summer-book (missal for the summer), Vm. 52, Pm. 86. sumar-bú, n. summer-stock, Sturl. ii. 65. sumar-bær, adj. calving in the summer. sumar-dagr, m. a summer day, N.  in a paper MS. to Vsp. 17, at 'súsi,' to the roaring sea (?), but as both the extant vellums, the Cod. Reg. and the Hb., read 'húsi,' this reading, if correct, must be traced to some lost vellum of the Vsp. (perhaps a lost leaf of the Cod. Arna Mag. No. 748?). The context, and the paraphrase in Edda, 'með sævar-ströndu,' are in favour of the reading of the paper MSS. and against that of the vellums.

 the word is obsolete in Icel., and the passage in Barl. stands alone in the old literature; not even does the Edda (Gl. in the list of birds) record this word; but it is preserved in provincial Norse sýsvorta (sýsvorta, sús- vorta) = urdsus torquatus, the ring ousel, Ivar Aasen: the etymology is quite uncertain.

T (tó), the nineteenth letter, was in the Runic alphabets represented by \uparrow , and in later Runes also by \uparrow ; its name was Týr—'Týr er einhendr Ása,' in the Runic poem; a marked \uparrow , 'stunginn Týr,' represented the d. Týr was the first of the third and last group in the alphabet, T b l m y, which was therefore called Týs-att, or the family of Tý, cp. the introduction to letters F and H.

TIGR, tegr, also tögr, togr, tigr, m., gen. tigar, pl. tígr, acc. tígu (tögu, tugu), later tígi, Band. 36, Fb. iii. 578; [a Goth. tigus is suggested by the adj. -tígus; A. S. tig, teg; O. H. G. zie, zuc; Germ. zebu; Dan. ty; Engl. ten.]
A. A ten, decade. The ancient Scandinavians and Teutons had no indeclinable numeral adjectives from twenty to a hundred; the word tigr (like hundráð and þúsund) being a regular substantive. The ancient way of counting is therefore complex and curious; e. g. forty-one was called 'four tens and one,' or 'one of the fifth decade,' forty-eight was called 'four tens and eight,' or by counting back, 'five tens short of two,' cp. the Lat. un-de-viginti, duo-de-triginta: forty-five was called 'half the fifth ten,' and so on, as will best be seen from the references below; and so it goes on to 'one hundred and twenty,' for in Iceland a hundred means the duodecimal hundred. In the 14th century (in deeds) 'tigr' began to lose its character of a substantive, e. g. þrjátígr, fimtígr, ..., or þrjátígi, fimtígi (used indecl.), whence at last came the mod. þrjátíu, fjórátíu, fimtíu ..., the tíu being a contracted form from the acc. pl. tígu. At the same time hundráð and þúsund became indecl. adjectives, e. g. þrjátíu, þrjúhundruð, þrjúþúsund skipum, for the old þrem tígum hundruðum, þúsundum skipa.

TIL, prep. with gen. As to this particle, the two branches of the Teutonic family vary: all the South Teut., including the Goth., present the form without the final l; Goth. du (qs. tu) = πρός, eis; A. S., Hel., Old Fris. te, to; North. E. te; Engl. to; Dutch te, toe; O. H. G. zi, za, zuo; Germ. zu; Old Frank. to, te, ti; while the Northerners add the l, as Dan., Swed., North. E. and Scot. til; the Swedes double the l, till. That til is the truer form is seen from rhymes, tíl vilja, Vigl.: on the other hand, mod. provinc. Norse and Swedish drop the l, thus te, Ivar Aasen, Rietz. The Engl. uses both forms, to, of place, till, of time, of which the latter is no doubt borrowed from the Norse or Danish: til = to is quite common still in Cumberland and other North. E. counties, 'to gang til Carlisle', etc.; a single instance of the form tíl is said to exist in an old Northumbrian vellum. Both forms, to and til, are, we believe, identical, the latter being a compound particle, ti-l, althou the origin of the l has not as yet been made out. The uncompound particle ti- is not entirely unknown in the Scandinavian, for it has been preserved in the compds mikils-ti, hölz-ti, unz-t, qq. v. Partic. even brief monosyllabic ones, often turn out to be compds, as e. g. (conj.), or the suffixed verbal negative; the prep. 'til' therefore is more akin to the Germ. noun ziel than is 'ok' (and) to ok (a yok, the apparent similarity in sense is in both cases merely accidental).

The passages quoted all refer to Iceland, except two or three to the Orkneys, and one to Norway, viz. torfmenn. In a country bare or stripped of wood, turf plays an important part in husbandry, as sod for buildings and fencing, and as peat for fuel. In the Orkneys the Norse earl Einar got the soubriquet of 'Turf-Einar' (Torf-Einarr) for having taught the Norsemen to dig peat (having probably learnt it himself from the Gaelic tribes in Scotland); the place was hence called Torf-nes, Orkn. The digging of peat in the poem Rigsmál is one of the many proofs of the birthplace of that poem. The only passage referring to Norway is that cited under torfmenn, a peat-man (see B), unless the legislator here specially had in mind the Norsemen of the Orkneys who, at that time, were an integral part of the Norse kingdom, without a special code of laws.

The ancient Scandinavians, like other old Teutonic people, had townships; Tacitus says, 'millas Germanorum populis urbes habitari sane notum est... colunt discreti ac diversi, ut fons, ut campus, ut nemus huius,' Germ. ch. 16. In Norway the first town, Níðarós, was founded by the two Olaves (Olave Tryggvason and Saint Olave, 994-1030), and the town was hence par excellence called Kaupang, q. v. But the real founder of towns in Norway was king Olave the Quiet (1067-1093); also Iceland, the words of Tacitus, 'colunt diversi ut fons, etc., placidum' still apply; 120 years ago (in 1752), the only town or village of the country (Reykjavík) was a single isolated farm. In the old Norse law the 'Town-law' is the new law attached as an appendix to the old 'land-law.'

UNDORN, m. (not n. as stated in Lex. Poët.), also spelt undurn and undarn, see the references below: [this word occurs in all ancient Teut. languages; Ulf. undaurni-mats or undurn-meat = ὄπιστρον, Luke xiv. 12; A. S. undurn; Hel. undorn; O. H. G. untarn. Afterwards it was disused in writing, but in provincial dialects it still survives in all Teutonic countries, Scandinavia, Germany (Bavaria, the Rhine), England (Cumberland, Yorkshire), everywhere, except in Iceland, where, strange to say, it is unknown in speech as well as in writing; thus, Swed. undarn, undarn, unden; in Norway undaaln; Bavaria untarn (Schmeller); Fris. ounern; provinc. Engl. orndorn, cunder (Broeket): in all these dialects it means a middle-meal, a kind of lunch, taken either in the afternoon at three o'clock (this seems to be the prevailing sense, at least in Scandinavia), or in the forenoon at nine: even a verb has been formed, thus in Sweden sova und is to take a nap at lunch-time, at midday (Rietz); in the Rhine country undern is said of cattle lying down at midday (Schmeller).]

B. USAGE.—In old Icel. or Norse writing the word occurs five times, thrice in poets, twice in prose; the original sense was undoubtedly a time of the day, either mid-afternoon, i. e. three o'clock P. M., or mid-forenoon, i. e. nine o'clock A. M., the sense of food being a derived one (like mál, q. v.);

I. mid-afternoon, answering to the nones of eccl. writers; morgin létu ok miðjan dag, undorn ok aptan, they called morning and midday, 'undorn' and evening, Vsp. 6 (undurn, Hb. l. c.), where undorn is placed midway between noon and eve.

2. mid-forenoon; um morgunim at undurni, in the morning at undurn time,

O. H. L. 65; þá hringt er til miðs-morguns, ok hafa unninn eiddinn fyrr en hringi at undurn (dat.) at Kristis-kirkju, when it rings at mid-morning time, and shall have taken the oath ere the bells at Christ's kirk ring at undurn, N. G. L. i. 308.

II. a meal; hjuggu vér undurn frekum vargi, we carved a meal for the greedy wolf, i. e. we slew many in the battle, Km. 2; örn drekkur undarn, the eagle drinks undarn, Edda 101 (in a verse of about 1030 A. D.), the various readings (undranar and undjarn) shew that the transcribers did not understand the word. In the Icel. day-marks only nórn (q. v.) is of eccl. Lat. origin; may not undorn be the old heathen term which was displaced by that word? the passage in Vsp. favours this suggestion.

V (vaff), the twenty-second letter of the alphabet, was by the ancients called vend, q. v. = A. S. wen, whence Icel. vindandi, q. v.; like u, it represented by V in the Runic; in old vellums by Ū, a form borrowed from the A. S.; later by v or u, according to the Latin usage. The Icel. v answers etymologically to Engl. and Germ. w (not v), but the form is little used, though not quite unknown in Icel. vellums.

B. PRONUNCIATION, CHANGES.—The v is now sounded in Icel.: in English, by a slight touch of the lip and teeth (not like the South German, with both lips). It is said (Rietz) that a w or double v still sounded in a remote Swedish county (Dalarne), and the opinion of English phonetic philologists is that the English w represents the old Teutonic value of that letter, which has since been lost all over the Continent, as well as in Iceland. The Icelandic formation of words goes far to prove that the old Scandinavian v was a semi-vowel, and not a full consonant as it is now:

1. traces are found of v alliterating with vowel; on an old Runic stone (of the 10th century?) in the island Öland (off the coast of Schonen) we read—Vandils jörmungrunða ur-grandari (v, i, and u making the three staves). In verses which have passed through Icelandic oral tradition, alliteration like this could hardly have survived, except in a very few cases (there are, however some such, svaf vætr Freyja átta nóttum, Þkv. 28; Óðinn á jarla þá er val falla, Hbl. 24; ónu verr, Ls. 36, cp. Hni. 22); but on the Runic stone the words still remain as they were first engraved.

2. the frequent 'vocalisations' involving the loss of v, which is indeed the most mutable of all letters:

a. ve, vi change into y, vá into ó: a v cannot be sounded before a u-vowel, viz. before o, ó, u, ú, y, ý, æ, ø; countless instances of this are to be found under the heads of vu-, dv-, hv-, kv-, sv-, tv-, þv- cp. as specimens the tenses of verbs, vaða, valda, vaxa, veða, sofa, kom; vinna, vinda, svimma, svella, vella, velta, verpa, verða, hverfa, svelta; sverla, sverfa, þverfa, sveigja, þvá, sverja; and also hváll and höll, hla and hót, ván and ón, váru and óru, kvef and kóf kaf kœfa, svartir and sortir surtr syrtar, verk and yrkja orka. Þ. more rarely, before other vowels, as, þeita for þveita, silungur for svilungur, hika for hvika, skaf for skvak, þi and þvi.

γ. v and j interchange, as in hjól for hve sjót for sveit, skjal for skval, jurt for vurt, jartegn for vartegn, hver for hjarni; in verbal inflexions, -va into -ja, as byggva into byggja, syngva into syngja.

δ. in a few words the v has been saved by change in the following vowel, as in verk, cp. A. S. weorc, virkr for vyrkr virgull (a halter, Goth. uurgils), væðr and œðr, Svænsk Sænsk.

for the loss of v before a u-vowel see the introduction to the letter Ó, U, Y, Æ, Ö; so in parts of England and in Scotland at the present day men say ool for wool.

ζ. in a few other words initial v is dropped when in compounds, vegr in Nor-egr, einn-ig, hinn-ig, þann-ig, hvern-ig; vang in kaup-angr, Harð-angr; völlr in preskj-öldr; valdr in Arn-aldr, Har aldr; verðr in dög-urðr; vindr in Ön-undr; vin in Björg-yn; vér or veigr in Þyri, qs. Þór-vé, and in Dan. Odeis-e.

η. again u has changed into v in várr qs. úrr, órr, A. S. úre, Engl. our, and in vesall qs. usal (see várr and vesall).

II. changes of later date, in the 14th and 15th centuries, or somewhat earlier,—old Icel. vá was turned into vó and at last into vo; svá, svó, svo; vár, vór, vor; tvá, tvó, tvo; ván, vón, von; vápn, vópn, vopn; vátr, vótr, votr; váði, vóði, voði; kváma, kvóma, koma: the old vá is proved by rhymes, as vátr and gráta svá and ú; that this vá did not change immediately into the present vo, but passed through an intermediate vó, is shewn by rhymes in poems of the 14th and 15th centuries; e. g. vórr and þórr, Skíða R. 47. 79, 119, 181; stór, vórr, 69; vóðinn, Óðinn, 109; vótt (testem), vórt, 122; góma, kvóma, Völs. R. 199; vórr, stórr, 212; stórr, hvórr, 248: the vó still remains in vóru (erant), although short o in vorn is rapidly displacing the old long vowel.

This later change of vá into vó, compared with the old dropping of the v whenever it came in contact with a u or o, shews that at the time when it took place (the 14th century), v cannot any longer have had the same sound as it had five or six centuries before, when the great and systematic vocalisation of it took place.

In mod. Icel. v has even reappeared in a few, especially verbal, forms (where people are still conscious of the lost v), so that Icel. now say hvurft, hvorfínn, hvyrfi (from hverfi); so also, but esp. in later vellums, less in speech, the forms vrúðr, vorðinn, vultu, vundu, vorpið, etc., from verða, velta, vinda, verpa; cp. also the mod. sound of the word Guð: again, in words like ull, úlftr, orð, una, etc., a restoration was impossible, all remembrance of the v having been lost for a thousand years; but phonetically, since v became a labial consonant, an Icelander might and could say vull, vúlftr, vorka, vorð, etc., just as well as von, vor, votr.

III. for the dropping of v before r (and l) see the introduction to the letter R (as in rangr=Engl. wrong): it is doubtful whether Icel. vág-rek (= a wreck, flotsom) bears any relation to vágr (a wave): the v may here have been saved by means of a false etymology, vagrek for vrak.

2. in a few cases an aspirate (h) has been substituted for an original w, e. g. Icel. hreiðr (a nest), cp.

VÁRR, vár, várt, mod. VOR, a possess. pron. This word has undergone several changes, starting from an original form uns, Goth. unsar, which was contracted into ús, cp. órir, p. 469; next the s changed into r (as in vera, heyra, eyra, járni), thus it became úr or ór-r, cp. A. S. úre, Engl. our; lastly, the initial vowel was turned into the cognate consonant v, prob. from being confounded with the personal pronoun vér. The old poets seem only to know the vowel form, as is always seen in alliteration, Vfm. 4, 7, Hým. 33, Hkv. Hjörv. 23; and so in rhymes, stórr, órar, Kornak. Thorodd cites this form, órar eru ú-rækðir órar; and the earliest vellums use it throughout. About A. D. 1200 várr begins to appear, an innovation prob. imported from abroad; thus in Clem. S. (Arna-Magn. 645), p. 147, 'ór', 'órum', six times (ll. 1, 4, 9, 12, 13, 28), but 'várra', 'vár', twice (ll. 6, 25); in a few poems of the 12th century, preserved in late vellums, the spelling is 'vórr', whereas the alliteration and rhyme demand ó, e. g. Líkn. 24, Harms. 53, 54, 58; in Ls. 52 'vömmiu vár' is an exception and otherwise corrupt, for 'vár' could not have existed at the time when that poem was composed. In this way the modern várr arose, being quite peculiar to the Scandinavian [Dan. vor, Swed. vår; whereas Goth. unsar, Germ. unsar, answer to the obsolete Icel. ossir; and A. S. úre, Engl. our, answer to early Icel. órr]:—our.

VERA, older form vesa, the verb substantive; pres. em, ert, er, pl. erum, eruð, eru; pret. var, vart (mod. varst), var, pl. váru or vóru; an obsolete óru occurs, Sæm. (once), Orkn. 426. l. 11, Nj. 81, Thom. 28, 90, 102, 116, 150, 196, Ísl. ii. 482: pres. subj. sé, sér (Vpm. 4, 7), sé; the older form is sjá, en ek sjá, Clem. 138. l. 14; at ek sjá... ok sé mér eigi reiðr, 145, Fms. viii. 299, x. 384, xi. 124, Eg. 127; for the forms sjákk, sjákk, see below: the mod. forms are sé, sért, sér (eg sé, þú sért; sért and ert make a rhyme in Pass. 34, 5): imperat. ver, vertu; see Gramm. p. xxiii: there also occurs a subj. pres. verir, veri, Sdm. 22, Ls. 54; þatz án veri, Am. 36; skósmiðr þú verir, Hm. 126, but rarely.

A. CHANGES AND FORMS.—Vera is an anomalous verb, which has undergone several changes: I. by changing s to r; of the older form there occur, the infin. vesa, pres. es, pret. vas, vast (vastu), vas; pres. subj. vesti; imperat. ves, MS. 623. 25. l. 14, 645. 61. l. 33, 677-

40. l. 38; vestu, 623. 25, Post. (Unger) 129. l. 27, 229. l. 12; vesur Hom. (Arna-Magn. 237) p. 214. l. 8; pres. indic. 2nd pers. est, Glúm 372; 3rd pers. es: but no traces remain of the older form in pret. plu. indic. and subj. (váru ver, never vásu væsi). Rhymes in poets and the spelling of the oldest extant poems shew that the s form alone existed in Icel. down to about the end of the 12th century, the time of Snorri Sturluson, when the modern forms crept in probably from Norway, for there the change seems to have taken place a century or earlier; the old Norse vellums (written in Norway or by Norsemen) are distinguished from the Icel. by their constant use of the r: the phrase 'at upp vesandi sólu,' in N. G. L. i. 4, being the only instance of the s form in all the Norse vellums. The earliest instances extant of rhyme to the r form are, the Ht. of Rögnvald, earl of the Orkney; he was a native of Norway, born about A. D. 1100, and the poem was composed about A. D. 1145; another instance is 'vara, fara' in Fm vii. 185, in a poem about A. D. 1140, written by an Icelander who had lived in Norway the greater part of his life, the rhyme is therefore Norwegianism. The first instance in an Icel. poem is in the Ht. of Snorri A. D. 1222. Instances from poets, Hallfred, Sighvat, Arnórr, and coev. poets; vesa, vési; sás með Sygna ræsi; þági vas sem þessum; vask-Róms í báská; vastu, kosta; vas fyrir Mikkjals-messu; nú es um ven þau er vési; bráskat þat dægtr báski: from A. D. 1100-1150, Geisli, P. etc., svás, væsir; esat, risnu; vasa, tysvar; vestu, freitni; vestu, trausti on the other hand, in the poem of earl Rögnvald, vera, skera; gera, vera var, skar (twice): from later Icel. poems it is sufficient to note, erð fyrðum; ertú, hjarta; verðú, forðast, Leiðarv. etc. This may sometimes serve as a test, e. g. var ek nær við-eign þeirra, Grett., and skap-kasaman vera, Gísl., are impossible in the mouth of poets of the early Sa. time; the verses of both these Sagas are a later composition.

2. to the spelling of the MSS.,—the oldest (the Arna-Magn. 677, the E. 674, the Ib. etc.) use the s throughout: vellums of the next period about A. D. 1200 (e. g. Arna-Magn. 623 and 645), use the later for sparingly, even the second hand in the Reykholts máldági gives 'es, n' 'er.' Again, in the vellums of the middle of the 13th century, such as the Cod. Reg. of the Sæm., the Grág., and the Mork., the mod. spellings have entirely got the better of the old, and an 'es' only creeps in, as unawares, from an older copy. Of the poetical literature, the Pd. also has been preserved in a copy old enough to retain the s; all the rhymes have the modernised spelling, even in the rhymed syllables quoted above such too is the case with the Cod. Reg. of the Sæm. Edda; but had the vellum been but fifty or sixty years older, the forms vesa, es, vas, e would now be the established spelling in Editions of these poems.

on Danish and Swedish Runic stones, the 3rd pers. pret. sing. is a word of frequent occurrence; the best Danish monuments have vas, e. g. i vas farinn vestr, Thorsen 93 and 101 (on a stone of the reign of Sweyn, died A. D. 1014). In Sweden the great majority present the later form: the so-called Ingvar stones are chronologically certain, being of the middle of the 11th century (Ingvar died A. D. 1039); there we read, 'vas' (twice), 'varinn' (once), 'var' (thrice, being twice spelt with h, once with þ): this shews that about this time in Sweden the later or more modern form had begun to be used, but that the old was remembered.

IV. the pl 1st pers. em [Engl. am] has changed into er (eg er, þú ert, hann er making the 1st and 3rd pers. uniform; this new form appears in vellu about the end of the 13th century, but the word being usually abbrevia (=em, ē=er), it is often hard to distinguish. In the Icel. N. T. and in thus the old 'em' still remains in solemn language, em eg, Matth. xi. 24; eigi em eg, John xviii. 17; eg em hann, 5, 8, xi. 25, xv. 1, 5, Ath. xiv. 27; em eg eigi postuli, em eg eigi frjási, 1 Cor. ix. 1; em erðinn, 20, 22, and passim.

VESALL, adj., fem. vesul or vesöl, neut. vesall. The forms vary, being contracted or uncontracted, veslir, etc., as well as vesalir, etc., whence lastly, vesælir, etc.: a. contr. veslir, veslar, veslun, Al. 57, Th. 6; vesla (acc. pl.), Hom. 109; veslu (gen. fem.), Post. (Unger) 108; veslir, Ó. H. 151, Sks. 681; vesla (gen.), Fms. viii. 242 (vesæla, v. l. of a later vellum); selum ok veslum, v. l. uncontr. vesala = vesla, Fms. ii. 46; vesla, Post. (Unger) 18 (vesæla, v. l.); vesalir, Al. 96, l. 18; this regular declension is still in full use in Icel. speech, only not contracted, e. g. vesall, vesalingr, vesalir (not veslir); vesæla, Fas. i. 49 (paper MS.); so also in the compar. either vesalli, Greg. 37, Sd. 188; vesalla, 656 C. 34; vesalstr, Kormak, Bjarn. (in a verse); but veslari, Barl. 23 (vesalli, v. l.) Ves is the root, -all the inflexive syllable; the form vesæll is a later form, from a false etymology, as if from vé- privative, and sæll, happy. The origin of vesall is dubious, the radical s is against a derivation from the compar. verri, Goth. wairiza; and the short vowel is against deriving it from väs, véss, q. v. The true etymology, we believe, is that vesall stands for 'usall,' being derived from the prep. ur, or-, in its ancient form us; Goth. us-; Icel. ur-, ör-; this etymology is confirmed by form and sense alike; the old phrases, alls vesall (omnium expers), vesall eigu (profrii expers), were originally alliterative phrases; in Hm. 22, 69, vesall is made to alliterate with a vowel (vesall maðr ok illa skapi ... erat maðr alls vesall þótt hann sé illa heill); usall is actually found written in Nj. (Lat.) 264, v. l.; the change of us into ves may be illustrated by the case of várr (q. v.); it is the opposite to that vocalisation of v which so frequently takes place. As to sense, vesall originally meant bereft, destitute of, = Lat. expers; and is followed by a genitive: [the Dan. form is usel, less right ussel.]

B. Usages: I. with gen. bereft of; mæl þú alls vesall, Nj. 124, v. l.; ok em ek vesall cigu, bereft of my own, Háv. 42 new Ed.; mæl þú alls usall, Nj. (Lat.) 264, v. l. (but allz vesall the other vellums); wretched in respect to, vesall þóttisk þóttisk hann sinnar úgefú, Hom. 121; vesall vigs, Am. 58; vesall ertú halds, Dropl. 30; vesöl eru vér konungs, Fms. vi. 322.

II. poor, destitute, wretched; þú vesall, Ls. 40, 42; mér vesalli, Stj. 523; það hana aldri þrífask svá vesul sem hön var, Nj. 194; veslir vættr, Hom. 150; veslir menn, poor wretches, Ó. H., l. c.; veslir menn ok vitlausir, Barl. 25; aumhjátaðr við alla vesla menn, Hom. 109; þat er veslum til vilnaðar, Al. 57; sú önd er enn vesalli, Greg. 37; þykki mér því betr sem þú görir hana vesalli, Sd. 188; sú önd er vesöl, ... enn vesalli (still more wretched), er ... , Greg. 37; vei verði niér veslum, Th. 6; sælum ok veslum, Ó. (Unger) 233; vettr is freq., esp. in N. G. L.; double consonants are in vellums difficult to distinguish from single, and so tt may well have been the current form, although the Edd. give the mod. form (vetr): in poets we find, mitt sextigu vittra, Glúm. (in a verse); viutr occurs in Icel. ballads of the 15th century, see Þryml., Völs. R., Skáld H. R., but here it is merely an imitation of Danish originals, for the word in Icel. always took the assimilated form: [Ulfr. wintrus = χειμών and étros; A. S., Engl., and Germ. winter; Dan.-Swed. winter, for the assimilation of nt into tt did not prevail in the south of Scandinavia, see Gramm. p. xxx, col. 1.]
A. A winter; winter, like summer (see summer), is a calendary period, containing 180 days, or six months of thirty days; the winter begins on the Saturday next before St. Luke's day (old style), or on St. Luke's day, if a Saturday. In the Gregorian style, for 1872 and 1873, vetrardagr fyrsti, the first winter day = Saturday, the 26th of Oct.; miðr vetr, mid-winter, the 24th of Jan.; síðasti vetrar dagr, the last winter day = Wednesday, the 23rd of April; Laugardagr skal fyrstr vera í vetri, en þaðan skal vera sex mánuðr þrjátígi náttu til sumars, K. þ. K. 166; vetr kemr laugardaginn er næstr er fyrir Lúkas-messu, en hana sjálfa ef hlauþarf ferr eptir, Rb. 490; Drottins-dagr inn fyrsti í vetr skal vera inn þriðri frá messu-degi Cosmi ok Damiani, Rb. 434; as a general term, í vetri, this winter, Nj. 4; hafa blót hveru vetri, Ó. H.; Miðr vetr, Mid-winter, see above; miðs vetrar skeld, mid-winter time, Fb. i. 204; miðs vetrar blót, a sacrificial feast at mid-winter, see miðr B; á vetri, or í vetri, see prepp, á and í; mikill vetr, a cold winter, Bs. i. 873; harðr, kaldr, Kominn er kaldr vetr, initial words of a hymn. II. = a year; as in A. S. days were reckoned by nights (see nótt), so years were counted by winters; in Ulflás (Matt. ix. 20, Luke ii. 42, viii. 42) étros is rendered by wintrus; and so at present in Icel., a person is so many 'winters' old; tólf vetra gamall, K. þ. K. 134; sextán vetra gamall, Grág. i. 197; and ellipt. leaving out gamall, tólf vetra, Fms. i. 8; tíu vetrum síðarr, 61; sex tíu vetra konungur, Eg. 367; sjau vetr ena ársömu, Ver. 17 (of king Pharaoh's dream); þeirra var vetrar-munnr, difference in age of one year, Dropl. 7; for more references, see tigr B. III. mythol., Vetr, a giant, the son of Vindsva or Vindlóni, Vpm., Edda i. 82. COMPS: vetrar-blót, n. a winter-sacrifice; in miðs vetrar-blót, Ó. Dan. saying, 'vise en vinter-vejen,' to shew one the winter-way, i. e. leave one in the cold. 2. astron. the milky way, in Icel. called vetrar-braut, undoubtedly from old heathen times, although the word happens not to occur in old writers; Icel. weather-prophets use in the autumn to forecast the course of the winter, by the appearance of the milky-way; this is evidently a very old custom, whence probably the name, for in old times fortune-telling used to take place at the great autumnal feasts and sacrifices, see the references s. v. völva. vetrar-dagr, m. a winter day, N. G. L. i. 348; á vetrardag, in the winter, Fms. viii. 50, Bs. i. 324, v. 1.; fyrsti vetrardagr, VÍKA, u, f., gen. pl. víkna, pl. víkur: [this can hardly be a genuine icic word, but rather is adopted from Lat. vice, otherwise the k root has remained unchanged; thus Lat. vicus is Icel. vé, Goth. vīk, Ulf. only uses the word in a single instance, viz. to translate εἰ τῆς ἐφημερίας αὐτοῦ by in vikou kunjis seinis in Luke i. 8, the Latin text 'in vice sua' perhaps suggested the word to the translator; A. S. and Hel. wica; Engl. week; O. H. G. wecba; Germ. wec; Dan. uge; Swed. wecba; in Norse dialects vika, veka, vuku, and in compds -oke, Jóns-oke, Ivar Aasen.]

 I. USAGES.—A week, passim: used in a peculiar manner, as marking the remaining weeks of the summer; líör á sumarit til átta vikna, viz. eight weeks remained before winter, Nj. 93; var Rútr heima til sex vikna; vá Þöðvar Kolbein Drottins-daginn at fjórum vikum, Ann. The ancient Scandinavians and Teutons in heathen times seem to have counted the year by pentads, called flint, as has already been remarked s. v. flint (p. 153), to which may be added the authority of the prof. Schlegel of Copenhagen in a notice of 1825, mentioned in Lex. v. l. p. 753. The time when the Scandinavians changed their system of reckoning is unknown; it would seem that in Icel. 'weeks' were already in the middle of the 10th century, could we but trust the record of the flint, as authentic in its details.
 II. spec. usages in the Icelandic language: Helga vika, the Holy-week (i. e. after Whitsun), Thom. 22, pl. i. 10, D.  VÍKA, u, f. [a word quite different from the preceding, akin to vík and víkingr, root word being víkja, q. v.]:—a sea mile, knot, answering to a nautical mile, and equal to a 'röst' on land (see röst, p. 508): the word seems to have been derived from vík, a small bay, denoting the distance from ness to ness, and so referring to a time when ships coasted along shore; the word is still in almost exclusive use in Icel. The following instances may suffice:—the distance from Reykjanes to Flatey in western Icel. is counted as three vikur (frá Reykjanesi til Flateyjar, s. Þrjár vikur sjófar, Bs. i. 461); from Drangey in the north to the nearest point on the mainland as one vika (frá Reykjum er skemst víkinar ok er þat vika sjóvar ... þat var vika sjáfar sem skemst víkinar ok er eyjunni, Grett. 144, 148); eyjar þær sem Ólafsv-cyjar heita liggja út á firðinum hálfu aðra viku undan Reykjanesi, 125; víkin til Skarfstáða hálfu viku sjóvar (viz. from Ljárskógar), 129; for the respective distances see the map of Icel.: so in Norway, vatnið var hálfvör viku breitt, Fms. viii. 32; sigla þeir fyrir þat torleidi sex vikur sevar, Fb. i. 186: in the Faeroes, þangat var skemst ok var þat þó löng vika sjóvar, Fær. 173 (viz. from the Great Dimon to Sudrey): in Greenland, hann lagðisk eptir geldingi gömlum út í Hvalsey, ok flutti á baki sér, þá er hann vildi fagna Eireki frænda sínum, en ekki var safstær skip heima, þat er löng hálf vika, Landn. 107: great distances at the open sea are counted by 'tylt', 'dozens, sc. of knots,' leaving out the word 'vika,' þá mun siglt vera tylt fyrir sunnan Ísland, Landn. 25: a writer of the 14th century calculates the voyage round Iceland direct from headland to headland at 'fourteen dozens,'—fjörtán tyltir umbergis at sigla réttleidis fyrir hvert nes, Bs. ii. 5. víki-vaki, a, m. Vík-dælskr, adj. from the county W., Fms. vii.

víking, f. a freebooting voyage, piracy; see víkingr. In heathen days it was usual for young men of distinction, before settling down, to make a warlike expedition to foreign parts, this voyage was called 'víking,' and was part of a man's education like the grand tour in modern times; hence the saying in the old Saga,—'when I was young and on my voyage (víking), but now I am old and decrepit'; so a son begs his father to give him a 'langskip,' that he may set out on a 'víking,' cp. the scene of the young Egil and his mother Bera, and the reference Fms. i. 69; see B. The custom was common among Teutonic tribes, and is mentioned by Caesar B. G. vi. ch. 23 (latrocinia nullam habent infamiam, quae extra fines cujusque civitatis fiunt, sqq.), only there it is a foray on land; (cp. the mod. American filibustering.)

víkingligr, adj. like a viking, martial, Ld. 276.

víkingr, m. a freebooter, rover, pirate, but in the Icel. Sagas used specially of the bands of Scandinavian warriors, who during the 9th and 10th centuries harried the British Isles and Normandy: the word is peculiarly Norse, for although it occurs in A. S. in the poem Byrnoth (six or seven times), it is there evidently to be regarded as a Norse word, and prob. so too in the poem 'Exodus,' in the words rondas þærnar sævicingas, over saltne mere; lastly, in 'Widsith,' as the name of a people, and Líðvicingas (=Liðungar? q.v.) The word 'víkingr' is thought to be derived from vík (a bay), from their haunting the bays, creeks, and fjords;—or it means 'the men from the fjords,' the coincidence that the old Irish called the Norsemen 'Lochlannoch,' and Norway 'Lochlan,' is curious.

 Nj. 12; hann orti kvæði ok eru þessar vísur í, Fms. v. 108; vísu lengd, the length of a stanza, Edda (Ht.) i. 666, 656: referring to the repetition of verses as a means of measuring time (minutes), Fs. (Vd. ch. 26); lausa-vísa, a ditty; nið-vísa, sóng-vísa; höldar danza harla snart, þá heyrst vísan min, a ditty; as the names of shorter poems, as, Nesja-vísur, Austrfárar-vísur, by Sighvat; Vísa-bók, a book of lays. Unlike the old Greek epics, as well as the poems of the Saxon Beowulf, all ancient Northern poetry is in strophic lays. Four sets of alliteration make a verse (vísa), two a half strophe, vísu-helmingr, Edda (Ht.) i. 610, or half vísa, Grág. ii. 148; one set a quarter of a vísa (vísu-fjórðungr); each alliterative set being again divided into two halves, called vísu-orð, a word or sentence, Edda (Ht.) i. 596, cp. Hallfr. S. ch. 6 (Fs. 96, 97); thus 'fastorðr skylji fyrða | fengsæll vera þengill' is an alliterative set. The velums give verses in unbroken lines, but in modern print each alliterative set is divided into two lines; this may do for metres of the dróttkvæð kind, with two rhyming syllables in each vísu-orð; but in the brief kvíðu-háttir (the metre of the Vsp.) each alliterative set should, for the sake of the flow of the verse, be printed in one line, thus,
 Hljóðs bið ek allar helgar kindir | meiri ok minni mögu Heimdalar; for a pause only follows between each pair of sets, but none between the sub-staves and the head-stave. This plan is that advocated by Jacob Grimm: the other, commonly followed in the Editions, chops the verse into—Hljóðs bið ek allar | helgar kindir | meiri ok minni | mögu

völva an initial s, we suppose, has been lost (qs. svölva); in the Greek the γ would be an inserted vowel]:—a prophētess, sibyl, wise woman; völva, seiðkona, spákona (qq. v.) are synonymous. The ancient Sagas contain many remarkable records of the heathen wise-women or sibyls, who were held in honour and reverence; at the great feasts and sacrifices in the autumn, the völva (often a woman of rank) went with her troop of maidens through the country, where she, so to say, crowned the feast; she was seated on a high seat (seiðhjallr) in the hall, where she wrought her spells and sang her 'weird-songs' (varðlökur), after which the guests went past her one by one, and she told each his fate, or whatever else one wanted to know, e. g. the course of the coming winter and the like. The former part of the Völuspá is evidently conceived as the inspired song of a völva, seated on her high seat, and addressing Odinn, while the gods listen to her words; and the latter part of the poem appears to be a kind of necromancy; or the raising of a dead völva, as also is the lay Vegtmaskvíða; sú kona var þar í bygd er þorbjörg hét, ok var kölluð lítil völva, hón hafði áttar sér níu systir, ok vóru allar spákonur, en hón var ein þá á lífi, þat var háttir þorbjargar um vetrar, at hón fór á veizlur ok buðu þeir menn henni mest heim er forvitni var á at vita forlög sín eða árfærd. VÖZT, f., pl. vazitir (q. v.), the sing. being only used in Edda (Gl.)

(ex) commonly represents ks, gs (as in other languages), where both letters are radical, thus, ax, fax, lax, sax, öx, vax, vaxa, sex, uxi, vöxtr, f, jaxl, öxl, qq. v.; but huga from hugr; lags from lag; loks from l; oks (gen.) from ok (jugum); rakstr, bakstr, from raka, baka, etc. The vellums use x in other cases, e.g. sterxti = sterksti, the strongest, Cm. 146; tax (gen.) from tak, N. G. L. i. 47; dúx = dúks, Clem. 127; lox = loks, 134; vitrleix = vitrleiks, 142; almattex = almáttings, 133; vla = vígsla, N. G. L. i. 9; fulltinx = fulltings, Ó. H. 242; vaxeliga = vaxliga, Mork. 178; lyxc = lýksk, Íb. (fine); fexk = fékksk (from fá to verb), Bs. i. 351; ux = ups (q. v.), N. G. L. i. 368; or again, vegs = v (the verb), Hm. 119; lags = lax (salmon), Sæm. 212, l. 20 (Bugge); dx = dags, N. G. L. i. 23; but on the whole the vellums distinguish gs and x, shewing the pronunciation in olden times to have been more distinct than it is now, when all three forms (gs, ks, x) represent the same sound, no matter whether the s be inflexive or not; thus in common modern spelling, both huga and huxa, dags and dax are used at random. In vellums x and r are very much alike; hence in the well-known passage in Vsp. the misreading of særum (sordibus) for særum (sibus), in all Editions, until Prof. Bugge noticed the stroke underneath the line in Cod. Reg.

Y is of later origin, and only found in derived words, being an 'umlaut' from u, (y from u, y from ú); in the Runic alphabet it is placed at the end, and marked \mathfrak{Y} , see Skálda (ii. 72); it is there called yt, a yew-tree,—yr er vetrgræst víða, 'yr' is the 'winter-greenest' of trees, Runic poem.

B. The independent sound of y, ý is now lost in Icel., being replaced respectively by the sounds i, í, whereas in mod. Dan., Swed. and Norse the old sound has been preserved; the old Icel. MSS., as well as the rhymes in old poems, distinguish both, except in a few instances, see Gramm. p. xxxv, col. 2 (7). The change from y to i seems to have begun about the time of the Reformation, but in the first printed books, e.g. the N. T. of 1540 and the Bible of 1584, the distinction is still well kept, the remembrance of the old form and etymology being then still alive. Later, the writing became very confused. Some transcribers of the 17th century, e.g. Ketil Jörundsson, a noted copier of old vellums, took the better course, never writing y at all, but i throughout; the same may be observed in the handwriting of some Icelanders down to the present day. In printed books of the 17th and 18th centuries the confusion is great, till of late an accurate spelling has been re-established, though even this fails in a few words; e.g. the ancients spell þryssar, gymbr, qq. v.; the mod. þrissar, gimbr. The poets of the last three centuries make i and y, ei and ey rhyme indifferently, according to the usage of the living tongue. II. an initial v is dropped before y, as in yndi, yrði, yrkja, etc.

Z

Z (zet). The ancient language had two sibilant sounds, s and z, which the z never stands at the beginning of a word, but is merely assimilated to a preceding dental, in the combinations ld, nd, nn, ll, gð, t, see Gramm. p. xxxvi, col. 1. β: its use in ancient vellums is extensive:

1. in genitives; trollz, illz (illr), allz (allr), hc Skm. 32; gullz, 22; ellz = elds, botz = botns, Gkv. 3. 9; vatz and = vatns; keyptz, Hm. 107; mótz, Knútz or Knúz = Knúts; vitz (v orðz, sverðz, barðz, borðz, garðz, harðz, langbarz, Gkv. 2. 19; Hjörva: Hkv. Hjörv. 19; morðz, bragðz, flagðz, Frissb. 107, l. 19; or also: Hm. 141, etc.; prestz, Christz, passim; tjallz, Edda ii. 314; landz or lz passim; fjallz, Edda ii. 339; but tjalldz, 527; elldz, vindz, 317, 318; gar 525; brandz, 529; valldz, 338; sverðz, borðz, 331; but borz, 462, l. garz, 529; loptz, 341 (twice); but lopz, 317; netz, 327; gantz, 3. hugskozius, Post. 251.

2. in special forms; stendz, Grág. i. 501 (fr standa); stennz, id., Ó. H. 143; bitz from binda, Post. (Unger) 154; ví vitz, vatzk from vinda (II), q. v.; but vinnz from vinna, q. v.; biz = bi from biðja, Post. (Unger) 240: indeed bizt, bazt may be both from bi and biðja: bleztu and blezza (to bless), hölltzi, qq. v.; beztr or baztr, best; œztr = œðstr; patz and paz = pat es, Sæm. passim; þatztu, Am. l. hvártz = hvárt es, Grág. (Kb.) i. 161: even mzz (or mzt) for the older þóttumz, Gkv. 2. 37.

3. when the z is due to a t following it; in reflex. -sk is the oldest form, whence -zt, -zst; andsk, andzst, and andzst: in the superl. zt, efitztr, Frissb. 78, l. 20; harðazta, l. 33; sna azta, l. 16; rikaztr, 207, l. 18; friduzt, l. 34; hazagt, Vkv. 18; grimmazt Edda ii. 530; máttkaztr, 280; hvitaz, 267; but st is the usual form, th sárastr, grimmastr, hvassastr, Gh. 17: in Ázt-riðr = Ást-riðr, Ó. H. 1. l. 12.

4. in such words as veizla, gæzla, reizla, leizla, hreizla, gæzl, lýzka, æzka, æzli, vitzka or vizka, hirzla, varzla, hanzki, = veizla, l. hirðsla, varðsla, handskí, etc.: in reflex. neut. part., thus, hafa bori komizt, farizt, tekizt, fundizt, glazt, sagzt, spurzt, kallazt, dæmzt, át ... (from bera ... eiga): in reflex. 2nd pers. pl. pres. and pret., e. g.] segizt, þér sögduzt, qs. segit-st, sögðut-st, so as to distinguish it fro the 3rd pers., þeir sögduzt, qs. sögðu-st.

5. Gitzurr or Gizzurr, Þja Özzurr; afraz-kollr, Ó. H. (pref.); huliz-hjálmr; Vitaz-gjafi, q. v.; t alaðs-festr, Grág. (Kb.) i. 88; viz, see viðr II: in foreign names, Jarleifr, Jariz-karr, Buriz-leifr, Gkv. 2. 19, Fms. vi. The etymology words may often be decided by this; e. g. in beisl, a bridle, beiskr, bitt, the s of the vellums shews that neither word is derived from bitr beiskr is in fact akin to Engl. beestings, Ulf. beist = βίση, A. S. beos geiska fullr, Hkv. 2. 35, is not from geit, but from geisa: laz or la (p. 376, col. 1) is from Fr. lace, not = Icel. láss: misseri (q. v.) is no relative to miðr, etc.: at lesti, at last, being spelt with s, not z, is not related: latr, but derived from leistr = a cobbler's last, at lesti = Lat. in calce, see M Sweet's Ed. of Gregory's Pastoral Care, p. 474: again, vatztr is akin to va = vatn: exceptional cases,—vissi, pret. from vita, and sess, a seat.

I after a single dental (unless it be t) s, not z, is written; thus, gen. Guð boðs, brauðs, auðs, göðs, óðs, vaðs, liðs, öls, fals, háls, frjáls, vins, eins, etc. passim: z is quite exceptional, e. g. liðz, Frissb. 106, ll. 16, 33 (but lið Hbl. 33, Am. 43): so also after rn, rl, ul, rn, rn, gn, barns, Clem. 134 karls, Hkv. 2. 2; jarls, Hm. 97; hrafnis, segls, regns, tungls (regus, Edd. ii. 340). The vellums are very irregular in the distinction of a single c double consonant, but the sibilant used shews the true form of the word in 'Odz Colssouar,' Ó. H. (pref.) l. 11, the z and s shew the names to be Oddr and Kolr, not Ödr, Kollr; in a vellum els would be gen. of él, ellz c eldr; in grunz, Edda ii. 287; lunz, 317; hlunz, ranz, lanz, 333; elr Post. (Unger) 234; golz, 225, l. 23; odz, Ó. H. (pref.), l. 11; alz, etc. the z shews that though there is only one n, l, etc. written, they were actually sounded double, grunzz, hlunzz, ranzz, landz, eldz, gollz, oddz allz.

2. the s does not change into z if the word is a compd. as, skáld-skapr, vind-svalr, út-suðr, passim; hirð-stjóri, Edda ii. 335 shewing that in ancient times the pronunciation was more distinct than at the present day; the z in orðztir (Edda ii. 344, orztir, 463) shew that the word is qs. orðz-tírr; yet we find such forms as innzigi, Post 238; guðzspjall, 239; ástzamliga, 243; handzceld, Barl.; randzaka, Post 134, l. 29; but rannzaka, l. 14; nauzun = nauðsyn, Skálda 167. 21; nauzun Edda ii. 236; anzvara, annzkoti, = andzvara, andzkoti, etc.

III about the 15th century (or earlier) the z sound began to disappear, and took its place, being at present the only sibilant used in Icel. In later vellums the z is therefore either little used or is misapplied, as in the additions by the third hand in the Flatey-book, or it is used to excess as in modern Dutch. In modern spelling, including Editions of Sagas, the z has been disused, except in the instances coming under the rule given in I. 4: yet with exception of ðs, for the moderns write leiðsla, hræðsla, beðsla, náðst, old leizla, názt, except in reizla (i. e. reizla) from reida; hirzla qs. hirðsla.

2. zz is sounded as ss, blesa, Gissur, Össur; so also vass, boss, = vatz, botz; even ors, gars, lans, sans, for orz, garz, lauz, sanz (gen. of orð, garðr, land, sandr).

P (horn) was adopted from the Runic alphabet; its ancient name was þorn (thorn),—þann staf er flestir menn kalla þorn, Skálda (Thorodd) 68, cp. Edda ii. 365,—and it is still so called in Icel.; the ancients also called it 'þurs' (giant), which was originally the name of a magical Runic, intended to cause love-madness, and in the Runic poem it is so called—þurs veldr kvenna kvillu; but in the poem Skm. 'þurs' means the magical Rune,—'þurs' rist ek þér ok þrjá stafi, 'ergi,' 'æði,' ok óþola, Skm. 36. Thorodd proposed to call it 'þur' (like dé, té, bé), Skálda 168. In the Runic inscriptions it is marked þ, seldom Þ; the letter is evidently derived from Gr.-Lat., being a Δ or D with the vertical stroke prolonged both ways.

B. SPELLING, PRONUNCIATION, CHANGES.—For the spelling of the ancient vellums see introduction to letter D (p. 93, col. 2). In Icel. there is phonetically a double th sound, as in English, but subject to a different rule; the hard th, marked þ, is only sounded as the initial letter of distinct syllables; whereas the soft th, marked ð, is only sounded as a medial or final; and that the case was the same in olden times, as early as the 2nd century, is borne out by the statement of the second grammarian Gramm. p. xv, col. 1), who counts hard th, or þ, among the 'head-letters,' as he calls them, whereas the soft ð he counts among the 'sub-letters' (p. xv, col. 2, ll. 4-6). That the initial th had only one sound in Icelandic is also borne out by the mod. Faroic dialect, which has the loosest affinity to the Icelandic; for here the initial þ has, in pronouns and articles as well as in nouns, changed into t, as in ting, tu, teir. But in the rest of Scandinavia the case is different, for there (Dan., Swed., Norse) the initial þ has been changed into d in all particles and pronouns, de, du, der, dem, den, dette, dig, deden, for-di (ti is an exception); whilst, in all other words, it has been changed into t, as in ting, taale, tre, etc., which points to a hard and soft th sound, used not as in Icelandic, but as in modern English. According to the views of a gradual and successive 'lauterschiebung,' as set forth in Mr. Sweet's essay 'On the Old English Þ' Appendix I. to Gregory's Pastoral Care, p. 496 sqq.), the Icelandic and the Faroic represent phonetically a later, the early Danish (old Scandinavian and English) an earlier stage in the development of this sound. It is curious to see how in the Faroic the sound has come round to Gr.-Lat. again; thus Faroic trir, tu, = Lat. tres, tu, in Dan. tree, but du.

II. in Icelandic a word with initial þ forming the latter part of a compound, or even if spelt separately, is apt to be changed into ð as soon as it loses its full sound, and is pronounced rapidly as an inflexive syllable, the latter part in questions becoming half enclitic, see introduction to letter D, p. 93, col. 2 (C. II). In vellums this is very frequent in the words al-ðingi, Svi-ðióð, al-ðýða = alþingi...; so also á ðingi = á þingi, Js. 39; örvar-ðingi, id.; Vafur-ðinnir, Sæm. (Bugge); hug-ðekkr, O. H. 16, etc.; the pr. names Hall-ðórr, Hall-dóra point to a Hall-ðórr, Hall-ðóra, = Hall-þórr, Hall-þóra; so also Stein-ðórr = Stein-þórr, for a þ could only change into ð through ð; in Arnórr, qs. Arn-þórr, the þ has been dropped (Arn-þórr, Arn-ðórr, Arn-órr?); litt-at = litt-þat, hitt-ó-heldr = hitt-þó-heldr, flýttir, make haste, already cited in Run. Gramm.; cp. also the change of the pron. þú into -du, -ðu, -tu, -ú, when suffixed. Quite different and much older is the dropping of initial þ (i. e. ð) in the particles enn = ann = þann, Engl. than, and in at = þat, Engl. that, Old Germ. daz: in the pronouns þér, þið, for ér, ið, the þ comes from the termination of the preceding verb. For the rest see the introduction to letter D, to which we may add that in single Icelandic vellum, the later handwriting in Arna-Magn. 645, now published in Post. (Unger) 216-236, is interesting for its uncertain use of þ and ð; at the time it was written, the ð was still a newly adopted letter, and the transcriber uncertain as to its use, so that no conclusion may be drawn from this isolated case; these are the instances,—upp þu, 216. ll. 9, 27, 219. l. 39; skírþr þegar, 217. l. 9; upp þegar, 220. l. 1; blezþu eim, 217. l. 34; af þeim, 223. l. 10; íyrir þeim, 224. ll. 14, 18; boþer eim, 228. l. 19; vip þá, 218. l. 13, 235. l. 5; þá þapan, 225. l. 17; af þvi, 219. l. 15, 232. l. 21, 234. l. 11, 235. l. 13; ífer þá, 222. l. 31; fir þa trú, 232. l. 34; frá þér at þú (sic), 226. l. 23; frá þér ef þú (four lines below); ek þip þik, 227. l. 17; vip þik, 236. l. 7: after a comma, þá er rétt, 231. l. 36; ðu laust, 233. l. 32: with nouns and verbs, of þorp ok borgir, 217. l. 35; ok dökkuþu, 224. l. 25; þeir dýs alþýðu, 227. l. 12.

III. the Icel. þ answers to Gr.-Lat. t, see e. g. the root tan (τένω, tendo, tenuis), compared to the Icel. þanja, þunnr; þrir = Lat. tres; þrómr = Gr. τέρμα, Lat. terminus; þeir, cp. Lat. tēpidus, etc., see the special words. 2. again, Germ. d answers to Icel. þ, ling, drei, denken; in a few words the laut-verschiebung is irregular, thus, Engl. tight, Icel. þáttir; þurfa = Engl. dare. Only a few words with initial þ have been adopted in later times, such are, þenkja, þanki, þrykkja = Germ. denken, ge-danke, drücken); these words were borrowed about the time of the Reformation, probably from German, not Danish, i. e. from words with d; in these words the laut-verschiebung, strange to say, has been duly observed, as if by instinct, which would hardly have been the case had it been borrowed through the Danish t: but in tráss = Germ.

dratzen, mod. Germ. trotzen, Icel. þratta, the true form has not been restored; so also in mod. usage Icelanders are beginning to say tak, tak (= Dan. tak = thanks), unmindful of their own þakk, þakka: t and þ are unsettled in þyrna and þyrma; tolla, see þola (II); tremill and þremill; þeisti and teista: f and þ interchange in Icel. þel, Engl. file: þel and Lat. filus, þel and fiol, and in a few other words: s and þ in suit for þust.

ÞADAN, adv., in Norse vellums often spelt þoðan, N. G. L. i. 23; þann, Ib. (1865), 6, 12, 14; [A. ÞADRA, adv. [Ulfr. þaðröb = ἐκείθεν, not = ἐκεῖ], there, an older form = þar; sádr var öngur fyrir þaðra, Sighvat; þar munu vér skina sem söl, ok þaðra mon Kristr sýna oss alla dýrd sína, Hom. (St.); kurum laud þaðra, Am. 97; górisk svá þrátt, at þaðra eru konur í borginni, Fms. xi. 99; þeir herja þaðra um eyjar ok annes, Far. 83; þótti hann þaðra í svetnum gildir bóndi, Fimb. 360: also in later poets for the sake of rhyme, slikt eru brögðin þaðra, Skíða R. 39, 152.

ÞAGSI, adj.; the parent-word of the mod. Dan. tavs (silent) has hitherto not been found in the old Icel. literature; it should be þagsi, but most if not all words of that form were obsolete as early as the 12th and 13th centuries, and have disappeared in mod. Icel., as hugs, stads, heits...; we believe it is preserved in the corrupted 'þegu varð' in the transcript of the Ib., where we propose to read, svá at allir menn myndi 'þagsi verða' (= Dan. blive tavse) meðan hann malta at lögbergi, so that all men would become silent whilst he spoke on the Law-bill, Ib. 7. In an ancient vellum a þi, with the upper end of the s faint or blotted out, and an u or h would be distinguished with difficulty; and as to an Icel. transcriber þagsi was quite an unknown word, while 'þegn,' 'þagn' were familiar syllables, he would choose the latter; the vellum itself was lost soon after the copy had been taken in A. D. 1651. In Rb. (Isl. i. 385) the word has been paraphrased into 'þegja'; see the Academy, vol. i. p. 278.

ÞEIR, þær, þau. This is the plur. of the personal pron., answering to ing, hann, hún, þat; gen. þeira and mod. þeirra; dat. þeim; acc. þá, þær, þau; in mod. speech þau is sounded þaug, which form occurs as early as Run. Gramm. of 1651, and often rhymes in mod. poets with words ending in g, e. g. flaug, þaug, Bb. 2. 17: [the A. S. uses the forms bí, víra, bim, bi, and so in early South. E., whereas the North. E. has they, bair, thaim; South. E. and Chaucer bi, bere, bem, Morris' Specimens, p. xv; Dan. de, deres, early Dan. deræ, dat. dem.]

A. They, them, theirs (see Gramm. p. xxi); töludu þeir mart, ríða þeir eim af þingi; þeir kómu í Fljótshlíð, Gunnarr tók vel við þeim; Njáll nætti til þeirra . . . slíkar fortölur hafði hann fyrir þeim, . . . þeir spurðu var tíðenda, báðu þær eigi leynd, þær sögðu svá vera skyldu; á þeim nuni illa sækjask at vinna oss, . . . vér getum þá eigi með vápnum sótt, and so in endless instances.

2. a peculiarity of the Icel. is the constant use of the neut. plur. 'þau' as collective for a masc. and fem.; síðan tengu þau inn bæði (i. e. Njall and Bergthora), at hann skyldi breiða yfir þau húðina; börn þeirra þjálfa ok Rösku, ok gördusk þau . . . þá er þau öfðu gengit litla hríð, Edda 28; Ask ok Emblu . . . önd þau né áttu óð au né höfðu, Vsp.; and so also of things, e. g. þau páll og reka; þau önd og fótr, and so on.

B. Special usages; this pronoun is used collectively before the names of two or more persons, the neuter being used when the persons are of different sexes:

1. where more than one are expressly named; au Ásgerðr ok Þorsteinn, they, Asgerd and Thorstein, Eg. 702; þeir tarkaðr ok Þóðr, ok Flösi, Nj. 282; börn þeirra Hildigunnar ok Kára, be children of H. and K., id.; synir þeirra Starkaðr ok Hallberu voru eir þorgeirr ok Börkr ok Þorkell, 89; synir hans voru þeir Kólr ok Ottarr ok Haukr, id.; bræðr Hallgerðar voru þeir Þorleikr, faðir Bolla, k Ólafir faðir Kjartans, ok Bárðr, they, Thorleik, Olave, and Bard, 2; dótr þeirra Þorkels föður Brands, ok þorgils föður míns, Jb. 20 (restored y Maurer; the emendation in the Editions is an error; the passage is arallel to that given above from Nj.); Þórr ok þeir lagsmenn, Thor and they—his followers, Edda 28.

2. ellipt., as it seems, where one part is understood, and not named; in this case the neut. au is used whenever the name understood is different in gender; eim Oddi, to Odd and his men, Fms. vi. 379; þeir Vagn, W. and his men; þeirri Pálnatöki, P. and his men, xi. 95; þeir Þóroddr, . . . eim Þóroddr, Hkr. ii. 251; frá skiptum þeirra Þóðar, the dealings of Þora (and Björn), Fms. iv. 110; þeir feðgar, they, father and son, Nj.; þau Ásgerðr, Asgerd and her son, Eg. 702; vinátta var með þeim andum þeirra, i. e. between him and their kinsmen, Grett. 132; þeirra æðra, Fms. xi. 160; þeir í Orkneyjum, Nj. 270; af þeim (those) fyrir istan árnar, 210.—This use of the pronoun þeir, þær, þau is peculiar to the old Scand. and Icel. tongue, and is not found in any other Teut. language. We take it to be a remnant from an ancient time when the title was still used detached and not suffixed, being, as in Homericreek, used half as a demonstrative pronoun; thus Iliad viii. 457, αἰδ' ὀφθαλμῶν τε καὶ Ἥρῃ, sounds quite Icel., þær Áþena og Herra; Icel. extend it also to the other cases, þeirra (gen.) Áþenu og Herra, þeim þenu og Heru; cp. also ll. xiii. 496, 526; the usage of the neut., as above, seems peculiar to Icel. It is therefore an error to explain 'þeir þóðdr', etc., as if a copula 'ok' had been dropped between the pronoun and the pr. name, þeir 'ok' þóðdr; it is in fact an elliptical abbreviated version of the usage in B. 1: similar is the use of hann and þin for the sing. (see hann B. II. p. 239, col. 1), and of Gr. ὁ as in Od. xi. 181.

C. For this pronoun as demonstrative, see þat, p. 731.

ÞEIRS = þeir es, Hm. 165 (heilir þeir hlyðdu), þd.

ÞESSI, fem. þessi, neut. þetta, a demonstr. pron.

A. THE FORMS.—The Icel., like other Teut. languages, except th Goth., has two demonstr. prons., one simple, sá sú þat, another emphati or deictic, þessi, þetta (cp. Gr. ὁ and ὅδε, Lat. hic and hicce); the latte is a compound word, the particle -si, sometimes changed into -sa, bein suffixed to the cases of the simple pronoun; Dr. Egilsson, in Lex. Poët first explained that this suffix was the imperative 'see,' Goth. sai; þess as well as the Engl. this-, the-se, tho-se, is therefore qs. the-see, that-sa

The forms vary much: I. the earliest declension is with th suffixed particle, like -gi in ein-gi, q. v., indeclinable; it is mostly s on the Runic stones, where we find the following forms,—dat. þeim- (þuic-ce), Rafn 178; acc. þann-si (þunc-ce), passim; þá-si (þanc-ce); plu þeir-si (þi-ce); dat. þeim-si (þis-ce); acc. þá-si (þos-ce); neut. plur. þau- (þauc-ce), passim: of this declension the vellums have only preserved th dat. sing. neut. þvi-sa, and the dat. masc. sing. and plur. þeim-a. On th Runic stones the acc. masc. sing. and plur., the acc. fem. plur., and the acc neut. plur. are, so to say, standing phrases—to raise 'this stone,' 'thes stones,' or 'these kumbils' (neut. plur.), or to carve 'these Runes'; but th other cases can only be assumed from later forms; in the Runic inscriptions they are wanting, because there was no occasion for them thus þvi-sa and þeima are freq. in old Icel. vellums, but are hardly me with in Runes. Even nom. sing. masc. and fem. sá-si (þic-ce) and sú-s (þauc-ce) are said to occur in two or three Runic inscriptions.

II the whole word was next turned into a regular adjective with the inflexion at the end, just like margr from manngi, öngrr from ein-gi, in which case the suffix became assimilated to the preceding pronoun, sometimes the inflexive s and sometimes the final letter of the pronoun prevailing; hence arose the forms as given in Gramm. p. xxi: a. the s prevailed in the forms þessi qs. þer-si; in þes-sa; in þessum qs. þeim-sum, þeni-sum; runum þinum (þisce literis) occurs in Rafn 165, but is there erroneously explained; in þessu qs. þvi-sa: acc. plur. þessa qs. þá-sa, þessar qs. þær-sar, þessi qs. þau-si.

β. again, the final of the pronoun prevailed in þenna qs. þann-sa, þetta qs. þat-sa; so also in þeima, which stands for þeimma, which again is an assimilation for þeim-sa or þeim-si.

2. the older form for gen. and dat. sing. fem., as also gen. plur., is bisyllabic (gen. þessa, dat. þessi, gen. plur. þessa); þessar messu, Hom. 41; þessar upþáras, Fms. i. 166; i þessi útleðg, 78; af þessi sótt, ix. 390; til þessa saka, Grág. i. 324, and passim; hence, later, þessarar, þessarri, þessarra; thus, þessarar, MS. 544. 151; þessarri, Sks. 672 B; þessarar, 786 B, and so in mod. usage.

III. a spec. form is þessor (q. v.), formed like nokkorr or engarr, but only used in nom. sing. fem. and nom. acc. neut. plur. (þessor bæn, þessor orð); it seems to be a Norse form: [A. S. þes, pl. þás; Engl. this, these; Hel. þese; O. H. G. deser; Germ. dieser; Dan.-Swed. denne is formed from the old acc. þenna; pl. disse.]

B. THE SENSE.—Þhis, pl. these. For the usages see the writers passim; it suffices to observe, that þessi is used both as adjective and as substantive; as adjective it may be placed before or after its noun (þessi kona or kona þessi): ellipt. usages are, i þessu, in this moment, Fms. ii. 60; i þessi (viz. hríð), in this nick of time, x. 415. For its usage with the article inn, see hinn, p. 263, col. 1 (II. 1); þessi inn skakk-borni, sveinn, Al. 29; þenna inn unga dreng, 656 C. 32, and passim.

ÞING, n. [no Goth. þigg is recorded; A. S. and Hel. þing; Engl. thing; O. H. G., Germ., and Dutch ding; Dan.-Swed. ting.]

A. A thing, Lat. res. In the Icel. this sense of the word is almost unknown, although in full use in mod. Dan.-Swed. ting, where it may come from a later Germ. influence.

II. in plur. articles, objects, things, esp. with the notion of costly articles: þeir rannsaka allan hans reiding ok allan hans klæðnað ok þing, articles, Sturl. iii. 295; þau þing (articles, inventories) er hann keypti kirkjunni innan sik, Vm. 20; þessi þing gaf Herra Vilkin kirkjunni í Klofa,—messu-klæði, kaleik, etc., 26.

2. valuables, jewels (esp. of a married lady), the law often speaks of the 'þing' and the 'heimanfylgja'; ef maðr fær kona at lands-lögum réttum . . . þá skulu lúkask henni þing sín ok heimanfylgja, Gþl. 231; hann hafði ór undir-heimum þau þing at eigi munu slík í Noregi, Fms. iii. 178; síðan tók hún þing sín, 195; eptir samkvámu (marriage) þeirra þá veitti Sveinn konungr áhald þingum þeim er ját vóru ok skilat með systur hans, x. 394; maðr skal skilja þing með frændkonu sinni ok svá heimanfylgju, N. B. As a law phrase [see þingvöllur]:

I. an assembly, meeting, a general term for any public meeting, esp. for purposes of legislation, a parliament, including courts of law; in this sense þing is a standard word throughout all Scandinavian countries (in the Tyn-wald, or meeting-place of the Manx parliament): technical phrases, blása til þings, kveðja þings, stefna þing, setja þing, kenna þing (N. G. L. i. 63); helga þing, heya þing, eiga þing; slíta þingi, segja þing laust, to dissolve a meeting, see the verbs: so also a þing 'er fast' when sitting, 'er laust' when dissolved (fasti I. 7, lauss II. 7); Dróttins-dag hinn fyrri í þingi, ríða af þingi, ríða á þing, til þings, vera um nótt af þingi, óndvert þing, ofanvert þing, Grág. i. 24, 25; nú eru þar þing (parliaments) tvau á einum þingvelli, ok skulu þeir þá fara um þau þing bæði (in local sense), 127; um varit tóku bændir af þingi ok vildu eigi hafa, Vápn. 22; hann hafði tekit af Vöðla-þing, skyldi þar eigi sóknar-þing heita, Sturl. i. 141: in countless instances in the Sagas and the Grág., see the Nj. passim, Íb. ch. 7, Gisl. 54-57, Glúm. ch. 24, 27, Eb. ch. 9, 10, 56, Lv. ch. 4, 15-17: other kinds of assemblies in Icel. were Leidar-þing, also called Þriðja-þing, Grág. i. 148; or Leid, q. v.; hreppstjórnar-þing (see p. 284); manntals-þing; in Norway, bygða-þing, D. N. ii. 330; hús-þing, vápna-þing, refsí-þing, v. sub vocc.—eccl. a council, H. E. i. 457, Ann. 1274; þing í Nicca, 415, 14.

2. a parish (opp. to a benefice); in Iceland this word is still used of those parishes whose priest does not reside by the church, no manse being appointed as his fixed residence; such a parish is called þing or þinga-braud (and he is called þinga-prestr, q. v.), as opp. to a 'beneficium', Grág. i. 471, K. þ. K. 30, 70, K. Á. passim; bóndi er skyldr at ala presti hest til allra nauðsynja í þingum, Vm. 73; tundur af hverjum bónda í þingunum, 96, Bs. i. 330, H. E. ii. 48, 85, 128.

3. an interview, of lovers, H. E. i. 244; þat var talat at þorbjörn væri í þingum við Þórdís, Gisl. 5; nær þú á þingi mant nenna Njardar syni, Skm. 38; man-þing, laun-þing.

II. loc. a district, county, shire, a þing-community, like lög (see p. 369, col. 2, B. II); a 'þing' was the political division of a country; hence the law phrase, vera í þingi með goða, to be in the district of such and such a goði, to be his liegeman, cp. þingfesti; or, segjask ok þingi, see the Grág., Nj., and Sagas, passim; full godorð ok forn þing, Grág. i. 15; í því þingi eðr um þau þing, 85. In later times Icel. was politically divided into twelve or thirteen counties. In old days every community or 'law' had its own assembly or parliament, whence the double sense of 'lög' as well as of 'þing.'

C. HISTORICAL REMARKS.—In Norway the later political division and constitution of the country dates from king Hacon the Good and his counsellors Thorleif the Wise and earl Sigurd. As king Harold Fair-hair was the conqueror of Norway, so was his son Hacon her legislator as also the founder of her constitution, and of her political division into 'þings'; for this is the true meaning of the classical passage,—hann (king Hacon) lagði mikinn hug á laga-setningi í Noregi, hann setti Gulapings-lög ok Frostapings-lög, ok Heiðsævis-lög fyrst at uppha en áðr höfðu sér hverir fylkis-menn lög, Ó. H. 9; in Hkr. l. c. t passage runs thus—hann setti Gulapings-lög með ráði Þorleifs spak ok hann setti Frostapings-lög með ráði Sigurðar jarls ok annara þræna þeirra er vetrastir vóru, en Heiðsævis-lög hafði sett Hálfán svarti, se fyrr er ritað, Hkr. 349 new Ed.; the account in Eg. ch. 57, therefore, although no doubt true in substance, is, as is so often the case in the Sagas, an anachronism; for in the reign of Eric 'Bloodaxe,' there were only isolated fylkis-þing, and no Gula-þing. In later times St. Ola added a fourth þing, Borgar-þing, to the three old ones of king Hacon (those of Gula, Frosta, and Heiðsævi); and as he became a saint, he got the name of legislator in the popular tradition, the credit of it was taken from Hacon, the right man; yet Sighvat the poet speaks, in his Bersögls-vísur, of the laws of king Hacon the foster-son of Athelstan. Distinction is therefore to be made between the ancient 'county' þing and the later 'united' þing, called lög-þing (Maurer's 'ding-bund'); al-almennilegt þing or almanna-þing, D. N. ii. 265, iii. 277; fjórðunga þing ii. 282; alþingi, alls-herjar-þing. The former in Norway was called fylkis-þing, or county þing; in Icel. vár-þing, héraðs-þing, fjórðungs-þing (cp. A. S. scirgemot, a shiremote). Many of the old pre-Haconian fylki þing or shiremotes seem to have continued long afterwards, at least in name, although their importance was much reduced; such we believe were the Hauga-þing (the old fylkis-þing of the county Westfold), Fm. viii. 245, Fb. ii. 446, iii. 24; as also Þróndarness-þing, Arnarheims-þing, Kefleyjar-þing, Mork. 179.

II. in Iceland the united þing or parliament was called Al-þingi; for its connection with the legislation of king Hacon, see Íb. ch. 2-5 (the chronology seems to be confused): again the earlier Icel. spring þings (vár-þing), also called héraðs-þing (count þing) or fjórðunga-þing (quarter þing), answer to the Norse fylkis-þing such were the Þórness-þing, Eb., Landn., Gisl., Sturl.; Kjalarness-þing Landn. (App.); Þverár-þing, Íb.; also called þingness-þing, Sturl. i. 94; Húnavatns-þing, Vd.; Vöðla-þing, Lv., Band.; Skaptafells-þing, Nj. Arness-þing, Flóam. S.; Þingskálá-þing, Nj.; Hegraness-þing, Glúm Lv., Grett.; Múla-þing (two of that name), Jb. (begin.), cp. Grág. i. 127 Þorskafjarðar-þing, Gisl., Landn.; þingeyjar-þing, Jb.; further, Krakrækjar-þing, Dropl. (vellum, see Ný Fél. xxi. 125); Sunnudals-þing, Vápn. þing við Vallna-laug, Lv.; þing í Straumfirði, Eb.; Hvalseyar-þing, Gisl. or þing í Dýrafirði, Sturl.; Fjósatungu-þing, Lv.

III. in Swede the chief þings named were Uppsala-þing, Ó. H.; and Mora-þing (wrongly called Múla-þing, Ó. H. l. c., in all the numerous vellum MSS. of this Saga, the Icelandic chronicler or the transcriber probably had in mind the Icel. þing of that name).

 B. There was also a different use of 'þinn' in the vocat., viz. in addressing a person generally in connexion with some word of abuse; þinn heljar-karl, thou bell-carle! Fb. i. 212; þitt íllmenni! Fs. 36; þinn skelmir! 166; also placed after the noun, even with the suffixed article, hefr þú svíkt mik, hundrinn þinn! Ísl. ii. 176; mun fóli þinn nokkurum manni gríð gefa? Dan. din bund! din skjelm! dít afskum! In Norway, even in a sense of compassion, min frýs du í hel, ditt vesle ting! gakk heim-atter, din krok = thou, poor fellow! but more freq. as abuse, di sugga! ditt naut! ditt stygge fe! or it is even there extended to the first person, eg, min arming, I, poor thing! me, vaare stakarar = we, poor fellows! eg viste inkje betra, min daare! Ivar Aasen's Norse Gram. p. 332. 2. in cases other than the vocative, but much more rarely; viltú nú þiggja gríð? þá svarar jatl, eigi af hundinum þinum, not from thee, thou dog! Fms. vi. 323; af fretkarli þinum, Fs. 160: acc., er ek sé þik, frænda skömm þína ..., er ek ól þinn úvita, Krök. 7 new Ed.; skulu vér færa þinn úvin til heljar, Fms. vi. 212. 3. in old writers even in plur., but very rarely; hvi róa djöflar yðrir (ye devils!), fyrir oss í alla nótt, Fms. ix. 50.—We believe this 'þinn,' as a vocative, to be not the possess. pron. but a compounded form of the pers. pron. 'þú' and the article 'inn,' þinn being qs. þ'inn, literally thou the...! A strong, and almost conclusive, proof of this is that the uncontracted form actually occurs and is used in exactly the same sense as the contracted 'þinn'; þú í vándi slangi, thou the wicked scamp! Skíða R.; þú inn armi, thou wretch! Ld. 326; þú inn mikli maðr, thou the great man! Eg. 488; v þú hinn góði þjón og trúlyndi, Matth. xxv. 21: the full phrase was accordingly altered in one of two ways; either the article was dropped, góði og t. þjón, 20, or pronoun and particle were both contracted in one word, as above. The phrase, we may presume, at first could not have been used in the vocative (þinn!); but the origin being soon in sight of, it was gradually extended to other cases (hundinum þinum and even, esp. in mod. usage, to the other possessive pronouns (djöf yðrir). Bearing this in mind, it is easy to understand why this usage peculiar to the Scandinavian tongue, for although the possessive pronoun 'þinn,' thine, etc., is common to all Teutonic languages, the article 'in' is peculiar to the northern languages, and therefore a word compound with it would be so also. Analogous are the phrases, sá inn, þat it, þ in, þann inn..., see p. 263, col. 1 (A. II). For another view, see Grim Kleine Schr. iii. 256, and 271 sqq.

The word occurs twice in poets in the same sense as in the Goth., a land; hrörnar þöll sú er stendr þorpi á, hlýrat henni börkr né barr, Hm. 49 (here 'þorp' seems to mean a field, fenced place, or garden, as opp. to the 'wood'); þrjár þjóðar falla þorp yfir meyja Mögþrasis, three great rivers fall over the field of the Norns, Vpm. 49. II. very freq. as the second comp. of Dan. local names, as -trup, or -rup dropping the t, Hos-trup, Kra-rup, Kolde-rup, Vins-trup, Sverdrup; but in early Dan. -torp or -iborp, thus Bukke-iborp, Thume-iborp, Ny-iborp = mod. Dan. Nytrup, and in many names of places, see Dipl. Thorkel. passim; so also Engl. -thorp and Germ. -dorf: in Norway such local names are rare, in Iceland still more so, yet a Þorpar, f. pl., occurs in western Iceland, in Stranda-sýsla, called 'í þorpum'. The reason is that in flat countries cottages lie closer together than in a mountainous country.

[perh. from þverra þorri = the month of the waning or 'ebbing' winter]—the name of the fourth winter month, the first after mid-winter; of thirty days, beginning on a Friday and ending on a Saturday inclusively; in the old calendar þorri is entered as beginning between the 9th and 16th of Jan., and the next month, Góe (q. v.), between the 8th and 15th of Feb., see H. E. i. 595; but in the new style, in Icel. Almanack, the first day of Thorri, 1873, is Friday, Jan. 24, and the last, Saturday, Feb. 22; mið-þorri, the middle of the month Tb., Edda 103, Grág. ii. 306, Rb. 46, Landn. 324: the name of this month is still the common term in Icel., the names of Jan. and Feb. being almost unknown in Icelandic country life; þorra-dægrin þykja löng | þegar hann blæs á norðan, a ditty, see Góí. For the mythical origin of this month, see Orkn. (begin.) and Fb. i. 21, 22. COMPS: Þorra-blót, n. the great sacrifice when Thorri begins (in heathen times), Fas. i. 17. G. donar; Germ. donner; Hel. thunar; an. Tor, in tor-den; cp. Lat. tōno and tonitrus; the word Þór-r is therefore formed by absorption of the middle n, and contraction of an older syllabic þonor into one syllable, and is a purely Scandinavian form; hence in A. S. charters or diplomas it is a sure sign of forgery when names compd with þur- appear in deeds pretending to be of a time earlier than the Danish invasion in the 9th century; although in later times they abound; the Engl. Thurs-day is a later form, in which the phonetic rule of the Scand. tongue has been followed; perh. it is a North. E. form. here is a short essay by Jacob Grimm on the etymology of this word.]

A. The god Thor, the god of thunder, keeper of the hammer, the ever-fighting slayer of trolls and destroyer of evil spirits, the friend of mankind, the defender of the earth, the heavens, and the gods, for without Thor and his hammer the earth would become the helpless prey of the giants. He was the consecrator, the hammer being the cross or holy sign of the ancient heathen, hence the expressive phrase of a heathen Danish Runic stone, þurr vigi þassi runar, 'Thor, consecrate these Runes!' Raín 193. Thor was the son of mother Earth; unt, hot-tempered, without fraud or guile, of few words and ready roke,—such was Thor, the favourite deity of the ancients. The finest legends of the Edda, and the best lays (the lays of Hymir, Thrym, and Þarbard) refer to Thor, see the Edda passim, Eb. the first chapters—ann varðveitti þar í eyinni Þórs-hof, ok var mikill vin Þórs, . . . hann ækk til fréttar við Þór ástvin sinn . . ., Eb.; Helgi var blandinn í trú, ann trúði á Krist, en hét á Þór til sjófara ok harðræða, Landn. 266; or a head of Thor carved on the high-seat pillars, see Eb., Fbr.: or on talisman, Fs. 97.

B. COMPS OF PROPER NAMES.—The name of Thor has always been thought to sound well, and is much used in pr. names; (hann átti) on er Steinn hét, þann svein gaf Þórólfr Þór vin sínum ok kalladi þor-einn, Eb.; uncompd only in the form Þóra of a woman, common in compds, where in mod. usage the vowel is sounded long before a vowel, and before b and d, elsewhere short, but in old times it is as no doubt ó throughout;—thus, as a prefix, Þór-álfr, Þórólfr, Þórarr, Þór-arinn, Þór-oddr, Þór-haddr, Þór-halli, Þór-allr; but Þór-bergr, Þór-björn, Þór-brandr, Þór-finnr, Þór-austr, Þór-geirr, Þór-gestr (Þórgestringar, the family of Th., b.), Þór-grimr, Þór-gils, Þór-guðr, Þór-kell (qs. Of all these names, three demand special mention, viz. Þórðr, being a contr. qs. Þór-róðr (as Bárðr=Bár-róðr), the old uncom. form occurs in poems of the 10th century, e.g. Þórðröðr vinou óra, Korm. 132; so ighvat calls his own father Þórðröðr (dissyll.), yet he makes it rhyme s if contracted (Þórðröðr er var forðum), so Þórðr skorðu, Bjarn. (in a verse): the other name is Þuridr, a fem. name, a weakened form for Þórðr, Íb. 363 (qs. Þór-ríðr, like Sig-ríðr); thirdly, Þyri, a fem. name, weakened from Þór-vé, or still older Þór-voig, mod. Dan. Thyra, ÞRESKJÖLDR, m. [this word is derived from þreskja and völlr, and prop. means a tresching-floor, because in ancient times the floor at the entrance was used for threshing, but it then came to mean the block of wood or stone beneath the door, doorsill or threshold; and that in ancient times it was so, is borne out by phrases as, Gríma sat á þreskeldi, Fbr.; or, stíga yfir þreskjöldinn, Eb. l. c.; or, þreskjöldrinn var hár fyrir durunum, O. H. L. 85; see the references. The latter part of the compd, -öldr, is from a time when the older ld had not as yet become assimilated into ll. The word is declined like völlr; nom. þreskjöldr, or, dropping the j, þreskjöldr; acc. þreskjöld or þreskjöld, Bs. i. 44, Fms. v. 140, Fbr. 14, Korm. 10, Eb. 220, Fs. 68, Edda ii. 122, Hkr. iii. 116, N. A): dat. changing e into i, þreskjildi (as if from skjöldr), H. E. i. 496, N. G. L. ii. l. c. The form þreskjöldr, found in mod. Icel. books, is a bad attempt at an etymology, as if it were derived from þrep and skjöldr. The form þreskjöldrinn, O. H. L. 85, l. 21, is prob. merely a scribe's error.

ÞÚSUND, f.; sérhverja þúsund, Stj. 298; á þúsund (dat.), Skv. 705; tvaer þrjár . . . þúsundir, 623, 53: in mod. usage it is mostly neut. (influenced by Latin?), but also fem. It is spelt þús-hund, Barl. 53; þús-hundum, Fms. vi. 409 (v. l.), Geisli 49; another form þús-hundrað (q. v.) is freq., esp. in Stj., Barl.; this double form -hund and -hundrað answers to the equally double form of 'hundred,' see p. 292, and is a proof that þúsund is a compound word, the latter part of which is 'hund' or 'hundred'; the etymology of the former part 'þús' is less certain; it is, we believe, akin to þysja, þyss, þaus-nir (a lost strong verb þús, þaus, þusu); þúsund would thus literally mean a swarm of hundreds: [in Goth. the gender varies, þúsundi, pl. þusundjos = χίλιοι, or þusundja, neut.; A. S. þúsend; Engl. thousand; O. H. G. thūsunta; Germ. tausend, qs. dausend; Swed. tusende and tusen; Dan. tusinde; Dutch tuysend: this word is also common to the Slavon. languages; again, the Lapp. áubat and Finn. tubat are no doubt borrowed from the Slavon. or Scandin.; the Gr., Lat., and Sansk. use other words]:—a thousand.

B. There is little doubt that with the ancient heathen Scandinavians (and perhaps all Teutons), before their contact with the civilised southern people, the notion of numbers was limited, and that their thousand was not a definite number, but a vague term, denoting a swarm, crowd, host (cp. the Gr. πυπιοι): in ancient lays it occurs thrice (Hlkv., Em., Fas. i. 502), but indefinitely; hvat þrym er þar sem þúsund bifisk eðr mengi til mikitt, what a din is there as if a thousand were sbaking, or an over-mickle multitude, Em. 2; sjau þúsundir, Hkv. i. 49, literally = seven thousands, but in fact meaning seven hosts of men.

2. the dat. pl. þúsundum is, like hundraðum, used adverbially = by thousands, in countless numbers, Fms. vi. 409 (in a verse), Geisli 49. 3. in the ancient popular literature, uninfluenced by southern writers, 'þúsund,' as a definite number, occurs, we think, not half-a-dozen times. As the multiple of ten duodecimal hundreds, ere the decimal hundred was adopted, 'þúsund' would mean twelve decimal hundreds; and such is its use in the Sverris Saga, Fms. viii. 40, where one vellum says 'tvaer þúsundir,' whilst the others, by a more idiomatic phrase, call it 'twenty hundreds.'

II. in ecclesiastical writers, and in annals influenced by the Latin and the like, it is frequent enough; tíu þúsundir, fjórtán þúsundir, Fms. i. 107, 108 (annalistic records); fimn þúsundir, xi. 386, Al. 111; tíu þúsundum, Skv. 705; tíu þúsundum sinna hundrað þúsunda, Hom.; þúsund þúsunda, a thousand of thousands, i. e. a million, (mod.); hundrað þúsundir rasta ok átta tigr þúsunda, . . . hundrað þúsund mílna, Fb. i. 31 (in the legend of Eric the Far-traveller and Paradise, taken from some church-legend); fjórar þúsundir, Þiðr. 234: or of the years of the world, sex þúsundir vetra, Fs. 197; sjau þúsundir vetra, Landn. 34.

C. REMARKS.—The popular way of counting high numbers was not by thousands, but by tens (decades) and duodecimal hundreds as factors; thus ten . . . twenty hundreds, and then going on three, four, five, six . . . tens of hundreds (a 'ten of hundreds' being = 1200). The following references may illustrate this—tíu hundrað, ellefu hundrað, tólf hundrað, þrettán hundrað, fimtán hundrað . . . , Íb. 17, O. H. 119, 201, Fms. vii. 295, xi. 383, 385. From twenty and upwards—tuttugu hundrað manna, twenty hundreds of men, Fms. vii. 324, viii. 40; hálfir þriðji tigr hundraða skipa, two tens and a half hundreds of ships, i. e. twenty-five hundreds, Fas. i. 378; þrjú tigu hundraða manna, three tens of hundreds of men, Fms. viii. 311; var skorat manntal, harði hann meirr enn þrjú tigu hundraða manna, vii. 204; þrír tigr hundraða, D. N. v. 18; nær fjórir tigr hundraða manna, nearly four tens of hundreds of men, Fms. vii. 275; á fimta tigi hundraða, on the fifth ten of hundreds, i. e. from four to five tens of hundreds, viii. 321; sex tigr hundraða, six tens of hundreds, 311, xi. 390; sex tigu hundraða manna, Fb. ii. 518, D. l. i. 350,—all odd amounts being neglected. The highest number recorded as actually reckoned in this way is 'six tens of hundreds' (fimtán tigr hundraða, fifteen tens of hundreds, Fms. viii. 321, v. l., is a scribe's error): it is probable that no reckoning exceeded twelve tens of hundreds. All high multiples were unintelligible to the ancients; the number of the Einherjar in Walhalla is in the old lay Gm. thus expressed,—there are 'five hundred doors in Walhalla, and five tens beside (the 'five tens' are, by the way, merely added for alliteration's sake), and eight hundred Einherjar will walk out of each door when they go out to fight the Wolf' (on the Day of final Doom). There seems to have been some dim exaggerated notion of a definite thousand in an ancient lay, only preserved in a half alliterative prose paraphrase, Fas. i. 502, where a mythical host is given thus,—there were thirty-three palanxes, each of five 'thousand,' each thousand of thirteen hundreds, each hundred four times counted. The armies in the battle of Brawalla, the greatest of the mythical age, are given, not in numbers, but by the space the ranks occupied, Skjöld. S. ch. 8. This resembles the story in Ó. H. ch. 59, of the two young brothers, king's sons: when asked what they would like to have most of, the one said 'Cows,' 'And how many?' 'As many,' said he, 'as could stand packed in a row round the lake (Mjösen in Norway) and drink.' 'But you?' they asked the other boy: 'House-carles' (soldiers), said he, 'And how many?' 'As many,' said he, 'as would in one meal eat up all my brother's cows.' Add also the tale of the King and the Giant, and the number of the giant's Louse-caries, Maurer's Volksagen 306. No less elementary was the rule for division and fractions, of which a remarkable instance is preserved in an ancient Icelandic deed, called Spákonu-arfr, published in D. l. i. 305. See also the words tigr, hundrað, skor, skora, and the remarks in Gramm. p. 112. The Homeric numeration, as set forth in Mr. Gladstone's Homeric Studies, vol. iii, p. 425 sqq., is highly interesting, and bears a striking resemblance to that of the ancient Scandinavians. We may notice that in Iceland land and property are still divided into hundreds (hundreds of cells = 120), see hundrað B; in this case a thousand is never used, but units and hundreds of hundreds as factors, thus, sex togu hundraða, in Reykh. Máld. (a deed of the 12th century), and so still in mod. usage; a wealthy man of the 15th century is said to have bequeathed to his daughters in land, 'tölf hundrað hundraða ok ellefu-tíu og tvaer hundrað betr, en í lausafé fimn hundrað hundraða,' i. e. twelve hundreds of hundreds and 'eleventy' and two hundreds, and in movables five hundreds of hundreds, Feðga-afn 16 (by the learned Bogi Benediktsson of Staðar-fell in Iceland, A. D. 1771–1849); síau hundrað hundraða og þrjátígi hundrað betr, 21; hann eptir-lit börnum sínum tjárumu upp á níu hundrað hundraða, 22—a proof that in very remote times, when this valuation of land first took place, 'thousand' was still unknown as a definite number.

Germ. Deutsch, Deutsch; Engl. Dutch; these forms shew that v and r are in the Norse wrongly inserted; the old Icel. word was evidently borrowed from the Germ. through the trading people, perhaps in the 11th or 12th century; it does not therefore appear in a genuine Norse form, for then the inflexive iskr should have been assimilated to the preceding root word, so forming a monosyllable; the mod. form Þýzkr is in this respect correct; the root word is Goth. þiuda = þjóð, see Grimm's Dict. s. v. ii. 1043; in Ulf. þiufisko = ἐπιδικάσις]:—German; Þýðerskir menn (Þýðerskir, Þýverskir, Þýðskir, v. l.), Fms. viii. 248; Vindum ok Þýðesku mönnum, x. 45, v. l.; Þýðerska menn, 47; en Þýðeskir menn segja, Fas. i. 332; Þýverskir, Fb. i. 355, l. c.; Þýverskr, Ann. 1342 C; svá segir í kvæðum Þýðersku, Þíðr. 304; frá sögu Þýðerskra manna, 334; Þýðesku kvæðum, 231, 330, 352; Þýðerska manna sögur, 180; í Þýðerskr tunga, 1, 302, 304.

Æ (Æ)

THIS is a double letter—æ, compounded of á and e (a + e), being a kind of appendage to á, and æ, compounded of ó and e (o + e), being an appendage to ó. In the alphabet of Thorodd the former was marked ǣ, the latter æ̅, as in vén, fóttr; later, the accent was dropped. The ǣ is also written ø, o, ø, or even o or eo, thus foti, fæti, ferri, or corri = cæri, whence in modern print, æ: most vellums write æ (a + e) and æ (o + e) respectively, which characters have been adopted in modern print. In Icel. the æ-sound was soon lost; only the earliest vellums distinguish the two sounds; then in later vellums ø, o are used indiscriminately, the difference in sound being lost, the characters remaining, till at last the useless sign disappeared. Almost all the Icel. Sagas are preserved in vellums later than the time when the sounds had become confounded; the Cod. Reg. of the Grág. still keeps the distinction, owing probably to its excellent old originals; the Cod. Reg. of the Sæm. Edda uses both signs, but misplaces them, thus, Hm. 92 mæla, but fœr (pres. from fú), in the same verse. The confusion between æ and ǣ is purely Icelandic, for in Denmark, Norway, and Sweden the distinction has been preserved up to the present day, thus, Dan. brødre, Swed. bröder, öföre, födder, böne, but sæde, natter, læge, etc., Icel. bræðr, dætr, fætr, hæna, sæti, nætr, lækniir, etc. The æ was sounded ē (as Germ. ä, in näbe, or a lengthened Engl. a, perhaps more protracted), this sound was still heard down to the time of Arni Magnússon (end of the 17th century), see Gramm. p. xxxv. col. 2; it is now sounded like Engl. long i (time), but this sound was unknown to the ancients, except in the interjection ai (= æ, see below)—we can only guess at the sound of æ; judging from the analogy of ǣ, it may have been like Germ. böbe, Fr. feu, only more protracted; in a diphthongal form (like æ into ai) it would be oï, and indeed the word æli in its modern form auli (i. e. oili) may be a relic of this. 2. v cannot be sounded before æ, being an u-sound; thus we have cædr, cæða, from væða, vðr; but before ǣ, being an a-sound, it is both sounded and written. For the umlaut see Gramm. p. xxix.

Æ, adv., in vellums also spelt ø, i. e. = ø; chverr, Blanda; þess Guðs er lifir ok e man lifa, Blanda: ea, ea standa mér augu of eld til Gunnildar, Ágrip (in a verse); freq. ey and ei, see ei, p. 117: [Goth. aiw in ni-aiw = never; A. ☞ In the verse of Sighvat (Fms. vi. 43) 'ætla' is, we believe, a corruption for 'Atla,' pr. name of a Norse Lagman in Gula, mentioned in Fms. x. 401 (Agrif ch. 29), and in N. G. L. i. 104; but it is now hardly possible to restore the whole verse, which had already been corrupted in tradition, so that when the compiler of Magnús Saga quoted it, he did not make out the full sense of it. The true context has been pointed out by Maurer in Abhandl. der k. Bayer. Acad. der W. 1872.

ÆTT, f., like sætt (q. v.), the forms vary between átt and ætt; in old writers the latter form is by far the more common; in mod. usage they have been separated, átt meaning a quarter in a local sense, ætt a family: [ætt is akin to Ulf. aibts = τὰ ἐπάρχοντα; A. S. abte = property; Early Engl. agte; Germ. acht = patrimony; the root verb is eiga, átti, like mega, mátt; from this original sense are derived both the senses, ætt = a family, and ætt or átt = Scot. 'airt', 'regio caeli,' the etymology of átt from átt (eight), suggested at p. 47, col. I, is too fanciful.]

☞ Genealogies (ættir, ættar-tölur, ætt-vísi) form the ground-work of the old Icel. historiography; the ancient Saga-men delighted in them, and had a marvellous memory for lineages; in the Sagas the pedigrees give the clue by which to trace the succession of events, and supply the want of chronology. Whole chapters in the best Sagas, esp.
at the beginning of a work, are set apart for genealogies, thus, Nj. ch. i.

Ö (Ø)

This letter properly consists of two vowels, different in sound and in origin; an a-vowel, an 'umlaut' of a, and nearly related to it; and a u-vowel, nearly related to the letters o, u, and y: in modern Danish these two ö-sounds are still distinguished in pronunciation, the one being open almost like Engl. i before r, as in fir, the other closed like eu in French feu: Rask and Petersen, the founders of the philology of the Danish tongue, were the first to give separate symbols for these two sounds; the first they marked ö, the second ø (burn, here). The modern Icel. knows only one sound, answering to the Danish ö; but that it was not so in old days may be proved from the vellums and from the grammarians. Thorodd marks the two sounds respectively by o and ø. Most of the vowels are very loose in their spelling, marking at random o, ø, au, ø, ø (oll, øll, aull, æll): phonetically ø stands exactly in the same relation to æ, the umlaut of ö, as ö to ø, the umlaut of ä, so that ø and ö are the short, æ and ä respectively the corresponding long vowels, ö and ø, ä and ä being two pairs of sounds, just as are o, u; cp. 'Goðröð' and 'göð ræði', Skálda, Thorodd: in very old vellums, e. g. the Rb. Cod. 1812, the ø is often marked eo, thus keomr = kömr, eoan = öxn = yxn, geora = gjöra or göra: in Norse vellums ø is often written æ, e. g. smær = smjör, confounding the two sounds, ø and æ. A few good vellums keep the distinction in the main, not as Thorodd's alphabet does, but generally by writing ey for ø (this must not be confounded with the diphthong ey); among those vellums are the Cod. Reg. of Sam. Edda, the Cod. Acad. of the Hkr. (now lost), the Cod. Fris., the (lost) vellum of Rafus S. (see Bs. i. pref. lix), although none of them strictly follows the rule; only a few Editions (e. g. Prof. Unger's Edit. of the Hkr.) have tried to observe the distinction; most Editions print ö throughout. We shall now try to give a list of the chief words and forms which have the ø. The chief guide in doing this is twofold, the ey of the vellums and the change of ö into e or i, by which a triple form arises, ö, ey, and e, of which ö and ey, no doubt, are mere variations:

I. the ø is either, I. the umlaut of ö; in the plurals, þónir seynir senir, hnötr hnetr, stöðr stedr (sonr, hnet, sted): in the compar. and superl., nöðri neyðri nerðri, norztr neyztr nerztr, öfri efri, öfstr efstr (from norðr, of): in the subj., þörði þerði, þöldi þeyldi (Fms. viii. 380), möndi (from þora, þola, monn or munu), biöggi beyggi, höggi heyggi (from bia, bjögg, höggva, höggju); the presents, kömr, tröðr treðr, söfr sefr (from koma, tröða, söfa); the prets., fröri freyri freri, gnöri gneyri gneri, söri seri, slöri sleri, röri reyri reri, kjöri keyri keri, snöri sneyri sneri, gröri greyri greri (see Gramm. p. xxlii): the words öðli eyðli eðli, öðla (a lizard) eyðla eðla, hölzti heylzti heltzti: in -röðr (Goðröðr, see Thorodd), -tröðr -freyðr -træðr (Halltröðr Hall-freyðr Hallfræðr), hnöri hneyri hneri, öxn eyxn exn, köri keri (a probe), kjöf (a choice) keyr ker, kjöþr keyþr keþr kjaptr: örendi eyrendi erendi: the prefix particle, öf -eyr -er: the words köt ket, smjöf smær, mjöf mél (prop. köt, smöf, möl), görmemar gersemar, örr and eyrr, a scar, Fms. viii. 275, v. l.; hröf and hreyf, heyrunn and hýrunn (p. 261, col. 2).

2. in the case of roots in -vi or -vj, where both v and j struggle for the umlaut, the result is an ø; in this case even a radical a changes into ø (this was for the first time observed by the late Danish scholar Lyngbye), thus, göfva geyvra gera (from garvian), görr geyrr geri (= ready), görfvi gerfi, görmenni germenni, öx eyx ex (Goth. apweis), sörfvi seyrfvi. This is esp. freq. in those roots which have g or k for the middle consonant, in which cases the root vowel, either a or i, changes into ø; as in the verbs slökva, sökkva, stökkva, hrökkva, klökkva, slöngva, höggva, hnöggva, þröngva; in the adjectives, dökk, nokkvíðr, glögg, hnögg, snögg; similarly with the orthography ey for ø.—keyfgr (caedo), Am. 39; deyqva bramsk, Skv. 2. 20; at kleypvi Guðum, Am. 58; klecqua, Akv. 24; hvi er þér steyct ör landi, Hkv. Hjörv. 31; nú mún seyqvaz, Vsp. 62; seycestu nú gygr (sink thou now), Helr. 14; sleyngdi svá silfri, Am. 46; steycer liðr tyrir, Hkv. 2. 2; sýtir æ gleygg við gjöfum, Hm. 48; gleygg, Skv. 1. 7; gleggr, 291; neykdan (nudum), Am. 49; neyqvíðr, Hm. 49; Beyggvir -böggvir, Ls. 45; rökvið and rekvið, Hkv. Hjörv. 35, Bugge (pret. ix); reykr = rökr, Fms. iv. 70: the word rekkja (a bed) is also spelt reykkia, and even rjúkia, Art. (Ed. Kjölbíng) 64; vekka and vökvi. Phonetically connected with this change, but in a reverse order, is the change in the words nekkveit nokkurr nokkurr and eingi öngur öngvan, etc. In all the above instances the ey means ø, and is merely substituted for that sound, and is accordingly altogether different from the diphthong ey, see p. 114, col. 2, l. 15 sqq.

3. one may also assume an o in the few instances where jo and jo, and jo and y interchange; in mjólk and mjolk (milk), mjok or mjök and nykkill, þjókk and þykk, mjórkvi and myrkvi. This ø of the ancient tongue is the parent of the e in several modern words and forms, e. g. in the presents, sefr, kömr, træðr, hegg, sekk, stekkr, hrekkr; in the preterites, grefri, snéri, réri; the compar., efri, efstr, helztr; in gera, erindi, frerar, and fréðinn: so also in the words két, mél, smét; and in inverse order, in nokkurr, in öngvir, öngvan, öngum, from einginn; cp. Dan. sen for sün. ☞ The close phonetic relation between ø and y is shewn by the fact that g or k before an ø was sounded as an aspirate, thus, góra, köt, kþri, sounded gjøra, kjöt, kþjri, and more lately spelt with a j, analogous to gjæta, kjær, = gæta, kær, for the j in these words is not radical.

II. for the ø see Gramm. p. xxix, col. 2, and the introduction to letter A, p. 1. Runolf, in his Gramm. Island. of A. D. 1650, distinguishes between o longum (ø), o breve (o), and o brevissimum (ö).

opposite-seat, high-seat, so called because two seats are placed opposite to one another; in ancient timbered halls the benches were placed longways, running along the walls of the halls (see bekk), with the two seats of honour in the middle facing one another; the northern bench facing the um, was called öndvegi it ædra, the higher or first high-seat, the opposite or southern bench being it úædra, the lower or second high-seat; the two high-seats were the most honoured places in the hall, and a chief guest used to be placed in the southern high-seat. In England the master and mistress sitting opposite one another at each end of the table may be a remnant of this old Scandinavian custom. The sides of the high-seat were ornamented with uprights (öndugis-silur) carved with figures, such as a head of Thor or the like; these posts were regarded with religious reverence; many of the settlers of Iceland are said to have taken the high-seat posts with them, and when near Iceland to have thrown them overboard to drift ashore, and where they found them, there they took up their abode. When a man of rank died, the son, after all rites performed, solemnly seated himself in his father's seat, as a token of succession: in Vd. ch. 23, the sons sat not in the father's seat before they had avenged his death.

ÖR- (i. e. ør-), a prefixed particle, altered from us-; the s remains in usall = vesall, see p. 699, col. 2; also spelt ør-, ør-vita, Hkv.; or øyr-, øyr-grynni, Ó. H. 106; øyr-lygi, Eg. (in a verse); [Ulf. us-; O. H. G. ur-; when uncompound, see ör, mod. úr, p. 472; as a prefix to nouns, ör- or or-, for which see p. 469, col. 2. Indeed, there is a strong probability that the negative prefix ör- is a contraction, not of un-, but of or-, so that ó-bættir is from or-bættir, ó-verðr from or-verðr, by agglutination of r, whereby the vowel becomes long (as the O. H. G. prefix ar- in A. S. appears as ä-): this would account for the fact, that in the very oldest and best vellums there is hardly a single instance of ú- for ó-, and this is the sole modern form not only all over Iceland, but also in most popular idioms of Norway and Sweden; a farther proof is that in many words or-, the ancient form, is preserved in a few vellums, especially of the Norse laws, in such rare forms as ör-sekr, ör-bættillir, ör-vænt, and ó-vænt, where the current form is ó-sekr, etc.; so also, ör-keypis and ó-keypis, ör-grynni and ó-grynni, ör-hóf and ó-hóf. Therefore or-, not un-, is, we believe, the phonetical parent of the later Scandinavian negative prefix ó-. The extensive use of ör- and the utter absence of ú- or un- may be explained by the supposition that, for the sake of uniformity, all words beginning with ör- and un- gradually took the same form; for though in ancient days ör- was more extensively used than it is at present, it can hardly have been the sole form in all words now beginning with ó-]:—ör- is used as denoting a negative, as ör-grynni, a being bottomless; or lack or loss of, as ör-sekr, out of being sekr; ör-verðr.

In Icel. on Ash-Wednesday, men and women, esp. the young, are all day long on the alert, being divided into two camps; the women trying to fasten small bags of ashes, by a hook or pin, on the men (hengja á þá ösku-poka), hooking the ash-bag on their backs or clothes, so as to make them carry it unawares; if a man carries it three steps or across a threshold without knowing it, the game is won. The men on their side fasten bags with small stones on the women.

During the printing of this Dictionary, sheets of these works have, by the kindness of the Editors, been forwarded to me, so that I have been able to refer to the printed pages long before they were published, as e. g. under kitla (p. 340) and matvælar. Prof. Unger has also communicated some highly interesting extracts from an old Norse version of 'Vitae Patrum' (cited Vitae Patrum, Unger), given in the Addenda (kaka, kaza, etc.), for which kindness I hereby tender him my hearty thanks: a few minor errors and corrections have been pointed out to me by Mr. Thorkelsson of Reykjavík.

barn-gjarn, adj. eager for bairns, Gsp.
bastarðr, m., cp. the remarks on bæsingr, p. 92, col. 1 at bottom, to which add,—This word is, we believe, derived from báss, a 'boose,' stall, Goth. bansts; its original sense would then be, one born in a stall or crib; hence as a law term, a bastard: hornungr from horn (a corner) is an analogous term, cp. Germ. winkel-kind. for in ancient Teut. laws and language the bastard or outcast was considered as being born in an out-of-the-way place. Both words, bastarðr and bæsingr (q. v.), are, we believe, one in sense and origin, bastarðr being the older form, bæsingr the later; from Goth. bansts was formed bastarðr, qs. banstarðr; in Norway and Icel. bansts dropped the t and absorbed the n into the preceding vowel, and became bás-s; from this 'báss' was formed bæsingr, with ingr as inflexive syllable, and the vowel changed; whereas bastarðr, we suppose, dates from an early time before vowel-change had taken place.

Both words are law terms, the former Normannic (or Frankish), the latter Norse: both occur as the name of a sword,—besingr in the mythical tale, Fb. ii. of St. Olave's sword, ere it was taken out of the cairn; bastarðr in Fms. vii. (12th century), perhaps a sword of Norman workmanship. Literally bastarðr means 'boose-hardy,' the hardy one of the stall, the bastard being the boy who got all kinds of rough usage, and so became hardy; we catch an echo of this in the words of the old lay—kóðu 'hardan' mjök 'horung' vera, Hðm. 12.

bata, ad, to better, John xvi. 7.

baug-broti, a, m. a ring-breaker, Hkv.

bauta-steinn, add the reference,—Eg. 94.

bautuðr, m. a stamping steed, Lex. Poët.

bál-hvitr, adj. gleaming-white, of waves.

bálkr (or better balkr, böldr), as a law term, add references.—enn fyrsti böldr bókar þessarar er um Kristindóms hald várt, N. G. L. i. 3; hér hefir kaup-bolk, 20; landleigu bolkr, 37; hér hefir upp erfða-bolk, 48; hér hefir upp þjófa bölk, 82; hér hefir upp úrgerðar-bolk, 96; hefir hverr hlutr þá bolku í sér, 126; í hinum fyrra bækinum, 424 (420, 421). Balkr as a law term is much older than any written code, and does not originally denote 'a section of a code,' but rather a 'body, collection of laws,' cp. frænd-balkr, ætt-balkr; but later it was a section of a written code, cp. Schlyter in the Glossary, s. v. balkkr.

name of the hero of a Faroic legend, told by Schlyter in Antiqu. Tid-skrift, 1849–1851. The legend makes him the father of the arch-pirate Magnus Heineson, a historical person, whose exploits are told in Debes' book; this Magnus, we may presume, served as a model to Scott's Pirate (that Scott knew of Debes is seen from note K to the Pirate). The Faroic legend bears a striking likeness to the Anglo-Norman Haveloc the Dane; both name and story may have a common origin, 'Haveloc' being a corrupted French form, with r changed into l for the sake of euphony. haf-rót, n. a violent swell of the sea.

hreppr, m., observe.—Konrad Maurer has communicated to me his opinion that the ancient heathen had organised rules and laws for the maintenance or vagrancy of the poor, which the Christian bishops afterwards amended and expanded. If so, it is hardly to be doubted that the division into Rapes existed even in heathen times; and indeed it would have been recorded by Ari in the Íb. had it been made in the time of the first bishops. The word itself and the autumn meetings for the poor are mentioned in Sagas referring to the heathen age, e. g. Fins. i. 225. The men of the 12th century looked on these meetings as a time-honoured institution, as is proved by the reference Fb. iii. 421 (only lately noticed, and given in full s. v. þinga); cp. also Bolla þ. (Ld. 350). These meetings are still held in Iceland.

höfuð,—the words in line 6 to 7, etc., are true in substance, yet the spelling höfuð does at least occur once in Cod. Reg. Sæm., viz. Hbl. 15 (Bugge); höfuð is certainly the true old form. To höfuð-hlutr, p. 307, col. 2, add,—in mod. usage, höfða-hlutr (in the dual), opp. to fótahlutr, and so spelt in Eg. 398; so also Icelanders say höfða-lag, the head-piece of a bedstead, also the pillow; eg fann það undir höfðalaginu; cp. the phrase, at höfðum þorsteins, at the heads of Thorstein's bed (here in plur. used of a single person); a similar usage of plur. or dual instead of sing. in A. S. is marked in a note to Mr. Sweet's Gregory's Pastoral Care.

kjöt-mangari, a, m. a meat-monger, 1 Cor. x. 25 (whence Kjöbmager-gade, in Copenhagen).

kland and klanda;—the derivation from the Gr. is erroneous, the word being an old Scand. law term; old Swed. kland = an action, and klanda (with acc.) = to bring an action for or about a thing, see Schlyter. In Icel. the original sense has been lost.

klessa, u, f., add reference,—Skáld II. R.

kol-fella, d, (and kol-fellir, m.), to lose utterly, of a man who loses all his live stock from cold or hunger; hann kolfeldi, he lost his all; það varð kolfellir: it may be a metaph. from cutting wood for charcoal; or perhaps a remnant of an ancient Scand. law term, preserved in early Swed., viz. kull-svarf = the death of mother and child in child-birth, and kjöl-svarf = of husband, wife, and child, all perishing at sea. see Schlyter. cp. Ld. ch. 18.

koll-vátr, adj. wet-haired, i. e. drowned, esp. in a ditty.

krýja or krúa, ð, hence the mod. Icel. grúa (það úir og grúir), changing k into g; [Norse krye; cp. Engl. crowd];—to swarm; það údi og krúdi, Egilsson's Poems. 25.

kvika, u, f. obstructions of the ducts in the nose, which used to be thought to be quick (i. e. live) worms; Vespasianus hafði kvikur í nösúm, en þat mein kalla þeir 'vespas,' því var hann kallaðr Vespasianus, V. bad 'worms in the nose,' which disease they call vespas, therefore he was called V. (sic), Post. (Unger) 155.

kvisna, u, f. a kind of bird, Edda ii, 488.

kögðir, m. a kind of stone, Edda (Gl.) ii, 424.

kögurr, m., as to the reference Hbl. 13, add.—the vellum has ogur, but the emendation into kögur is received by Editors; and is made certain by 'kögur-sveinn' in the same verse; but the sense and origin of kögur in this place have been missed by the interpreters. It is indeed a well-known Teut. word, A. S. cocur, O. H. G. chochar, Germ. kocher, Dutch koker; the Dan. kogger is prob. borrowed from the Germ., as is the Icel. koffur from Luther's Bible; once on a time it was also a Scand. word, which was since displaced by the compounded örva-malr or ör-malr, q. v.; this passage being the only place where it occurs in an uncompounded form, but it remains in kögur-sveinn, a quiver-boy, who carried the hunter's quiver (?); and in kögur-barn, Norse kogge-barn. Prof. Bergmann has, with his usual insight in Eddic matters, divined the sense when he says, p. 123, 'über den Sund zu schwimmen und dabei seinen feurigen Donner- und blitz-keil, . . . im Wasser zu netzen und abzukühlen.' The fact is, Thor is here represented carrying a quiver full of thunder-bolts on his back, and so the poet makes the mighty thunder-god stop at the Sound, embarrassed, and begging to be ferried over, as he could not wade over from fear of wetting his quiver and quenching the fire, for he must 'keep his powder dry;' although in Gm. and Þd. Thor is not much afraid of the water. Whether kögurr, a quilt, be any relation to kögurr, a quiver, we cannot tell, prob. not; if so, this word should be placed under a separate head.

laga-setning, f. legislation (p. 370, col. 1); this word requires explanation,—in old writers it means the constitution, the fundamental laws or political constitution of a commonwealth; as Ari, the historian, says, 'frá Íslands bygd, frá landnáms-mönnum ok lagasetning,' of the settlement of Iceland, of her settlers and her political constitution, Íb. (pref.); where lagasetning refers to the institution of the þing, and the other events related in Íb. ch. 2 and 3; so also, ritaði hann (viz. Ari) mest í upphafi sinnar bókar um Íslands bygd (the settlement), ok lagasetning (constitution), Hkr. (pref.), referring to the constitutional laws of Ulfljot recorded in ch. 2 of the Icelander Book; lagasetning here exactly answers to what Konrad Maurer, by a mod. term, calls 'die entstehung des Isländisches staates.' So also of the laws of king Hakon the Good (cp. the remarks s. v. þing), lagasetning Hákonar konungs, . . . hann (the king) var maðr stórvitr, ok lagði mikinn hug á lagasetning, hann 'setti' Gulapings-lög . . . Hkr. i. 135 (cp. Fms. i. 31): again, in Ó.H. 227 it answers to the mod. word legislation (of the laws of Sweyn, the son of Alfita), and so Orkn. 24. It is to be borne in mind that 'lög' has a double sense, viz. law in a strict sense, and in a local-political sense = a 'law-community,' legally constituted state, nearly answering to Gr. πόλις.

lang-viðri, n., add.—langviðrum skjal eyða grund, Mk. 24; cp. Ísland eyðist af langviðrum ok lagaleysi, Ísl. Þjóðs. i. 438.

ledda, u, f. a lead, plumb, a fisher's term in western Iceland.

leið-angr, m. a levy; add.—may not this word be qs. leiðvangr = the field of the Leet, where a Leet was held? if so, it would throw light on the origin of this meeting in very remote times as being a muster-meeting or levy of the king's service: afterwards leiðangr might have come to mean the levy itself. It is indeed difficult to explain this word in any other way, esp. the latter part -angr, which usually denotes a place.

leiðanligr, adj. ductile, manageable, Post.

leiði-þirr, m. a ἀρ. λεγ., Haustl.; wrongly explained by Egilsson, it is evidently the A. S. lād-þeow = a leader, guide.

leikni, f. playfulness, curiosity; göra e-ð til leiknis, Ísl. Þjóðs. i. 615.

léttis-maðr = leytismaðr (or hleyttismaðr), a vicar, Post. 34.

liðr, observe,—the passage in Hm., svá at hón lyki þik liðum, is perhaps illustrated by Chaucer's 'locen in every lith,' Nonne's Priest's Tale; embraces of witches being believed to rob a man of his manhood.

limpa, u, f. limpness, weakness, FéL. xv; það er limpa í mér, (mod.)

lík-brá, f. = valbrá (q. v.), FéL.

ljós-ker, n., prop. a 'light-vessel, a lamp (not lantern), cp. Mar. 679, 1036, 1037, Thom. 483.

ljúga, the verb, add.—pret. pl. lógo, Post. 231; later lugu.

loða, the verb, the Clem. 24 (Post. Unger 63), read,—fundu þeir, at hann lóddi 'saman' flærð einni; the passage is therefore quite plain.

logn-alda, u, f. rolling in a calm, of a ship.

lok, n., add.—the word remains in Engl. hem-lock.

Loki, the name of the terrible fire-demon, half god, half giant, the friend and companion of the gods, and yet their most fearful foe. We have a new suggestion to make as to the origin of this name. The old Northern Loki and the old Italic Vulcanus are, we believe, identical; as thus,—the old Teutonic form of Loki, we suppose, was Wloka, whence, by dropping the w before l, according to the rules of the Scandinavian tongue, Loki. A complete analogy is presented in Lat. volutus, vultus, A. S. wlits, but Icel. lit (in and-lit, a face); and, in point of the character of the two demons, the resemblance is no less striking, as we have on the one hand Vulcanus with Etna for his workshop (cp. the mod. vulcano), and on the other hand the Northern legends of the fettered fire-giant, Loki, by whose struggles the earthquakes are caused. Of all the personages of the Northern heathen religion, the three, Óðinn, Þórr, and Loki, were by far the most prominent; but not even the name of Loki is preserved in the records of any other Teutonic people. Can the words of Caesar B. G. vi, xxi, Solem 'Vulcanum' et Lunam, refer to our Loki? probably not, although in Caesar's time the form would have been Wlokan in acc., a form which a Roman ear might well have identified with their own Vulcanus. The old derivation from loka, to shut, is inadmissible in the present state of philological science; a Wödan from vaða, or Loki from loka, is no better than a 'Juno a juvando,' or a 'Neptunus a nando.' May not Loki (Wloka) be a relation to the Sansk. vika, Slav. vluku, Lith. vilkas, Icel. vargr, ulfr, meaning a destroyer, a wolf? it is very significant that in the Norse mythology Loki is the father of the world-destroying monsters,—the wolf Fenrir, the World-serpent, and the ogress Hel; and, if the etymology suggested be true, he was himself originally represented as a wolf.

lopt-hæna, u, f. a female pr. name, Landn.; talp, a kind of duck, cp. skálp-hæna (in the Addenda).

lókr, add,—that it originally was a law term, a receiver of stolen goods, is seen from Chaucer (Coke's Tale, 51), 'there is no thief without a louk.'

lund-lag, n. temper.

lund-lagt, part. n. minded, disposed, e-m er e-t l., Post. 481, 633.

lyf-steinn, in the vellum of Korm. S. (A. M. 232) it is always spelt with y (not lifsteinn), thus Unger, who has himself consulted the vellum.

lykt, f. [Dan. lögte], a lantern, Bs. ii, 257.

lýð-skyldi, add—fem. in Fms. x. 339 (sjá hlýðskyldi); but hlýðskyldis, 398.

lýsa, the verb, II. 3. 7, lýsa e-u yfir, better is lýsa yfir e-u.

læri-sveinn, this word is a translation of A. S. leorning-cniht, a word used in Ælfric's English at the time when Christianity was transported from England to Norway and Iceland; at a still earlier time the English rendered 'discipulus' by 'þegn' (Gregory's Pastoral Care).

löd, f. a laube, add—the old form was prob. lauð, with a diphthong; the mod. form is löð, gen. laðar.

mal, n. the purring of a cat, Snót 132.

man, a bondman, add.—mans-fólk, captive-folk, prisoners; in Orkn. 368 (Fb. ii, 486, l. 8), þeir seldu þeim silfr ok 'annat fé' is corrupted for 'mans-fólk,' as is seen from the words of the Danish translation of 1615—'ok solde demnem fangerne.'

mann-bikkja, u, f. a 'man-bite,' a term of abuse, Post. 151.

manngi, add,—þrætta ek við manngi, Post. 230.

man-vélar, f. pl. love-tricks, Hbl. 20.

mat, n. an estimate; the truer form is mátt (like dráp, nám, gát, át, from drepa . . .); the word was originally a Norse law term, and is not found in the Grág., but was, at the union with Norway, adopted in Icel., where it soon lost its long vowel; it is actually spelt maat (i. e. mátt) in D. N. ii, 225 (maats menn = taxation); eptir sex manna máti, Jb.; eptir göðra manni máti, Vm.; eptir máti, id. (Mr. Jón Thorkelsson).

mat-fiskr, m. fish for food, Post.

mási, a, m. a nickname, Fms., add—prop. the name of a bird; in Faro maasi is a sea-mew; val-maasi, Uislands-maasi (= an Icelandic mew), fiski-maasi, see Mr. H. C. Mülller's Færøernes Fugle-fauna (1863).

meðan, add,—hence Dan. men = bæt, contracted from meden.

megin-byri, n. a fair wind, Post. 233.

mel-fluga, u, f. a moth in clothes, (mod.)

mest-megnis, adv. for the most part, (mod.)

mæt, n. sing. = mátt, an estimate, D. N. ii, 31; lög-m., Mar. (pref. p. xxxv).

meta, the verb, at the beginning, observe,—the subj. mæti occurs in Völs. S. 85 (Bugge's Ed.)

mey-nunna, u, f. a nun, = virgo monacha, Vitae Patrum (Unger).

mið-seymi, n., sounded missey, the gut used in shoe-making.

mikill, add the saying,—mikið skal til mikils vinna. Vidal. ii. 64.
mikla, ad, add,—hann kvæðsk eigi mundu mikla tillögu við hann ór því hann hafði til unnit. Band. (MS., begin.); the printed text is corrupt.
mis-dægrt, n. adj.; in the phrase, honum verðr aldri misdægrt, of a person who is never ill for a single day.
mis-gáningr, m. an inadvantage.
mis-grip, n. a. 'mis-grip,' mistake; in the phrase, taka e-t í misgripum, take a thing by the wrong end, make a mistake, (mod.)
mis-klíð, f. discord.
mjalli, a, m. [mjöll], whiteness; esp. in the phrase, vera ekki með lum mjalla, to be not 'in one's whole whiteness,' i. e. to be not in one's senses, to be insane.
móða, u, f. II, add,—af allri móðu bitra munugða. Post. 555.
mót, a meeting; dele the word 'móts-minni,' which is only a false reading of m for ni, see njóts-minni below.
mun-hugð = munud (q. v.), Post. (Unger) 117.
munu, the verb, add,—munu in exclamations of wonder, contempt; vat moni hvelpr sá ráða gríðum? Mork. 80; hvat muni of vinna örúm stum, what should overcome our love? i. e. come what may, it is proof against all, Korm. (in a verse).
mystr = myrkr (?), Mar. 1031.
mýgja, the verb, add,—an older pret. mugði or mögði; hence, né iögðu menn óleitit, nor did the people quell their cheer, i. e. they were in ígð spirits, Þd. (and not as explained in Lex. Poët.); at hann mýgði (subj.) allri mekt Gyðinga, that be quelled all the might of the Jews, ost. (Unger) 104.
mýr-dæla, u, f. 'mire-dale,' a miry, boggy hollow, Hallgr.
mœrr, f. = mýrr, a moor, bog; æpa kann í mœrum fróskr, Mkv.

mösní, a, m. the name of a bear, Edda (Gl.)
-na, add,—satt-na, Bs. i. 469, v. l.
nagl-hald, n. a nail's hold, Bs. ii. 503.
naumr, add,—naum gríð, Bs. ii. 508 (17th century); vera naumt við omínn, to be pressed for time.
nár, B, add,—ná-bönd, n. pl. the cords by which the shroud is bound round the body, Mar.
nef-lauss, adj. [nefi], 'kinless,' orphaned, desolate; sagt er frá hve eflauss narir, Mkv.
nekkverr, add.—Mr. Uppström, and since Bugge, derive this word from ne-veit-hverr, instead of Grimm's ne-hverr, cp. A. S. nātwaet = ne-veit-bwaet = Icel. nakkvat; this would better account for the double k, but otherwise it has no influence on the inflexive changes of the word.
B. nekkverr. In B. IV. 3, nokkor should be put under a separate head as loc. adverb, = somewhere, anywhere, qs. ne-hvar or ne-icit-hvar.
nema, the verb, add,—a pret. numdi in mod. usage, formed from the art. numinn, as if from a verb nymja; örvaðist geð á allan hátt er eg umdi sjónum | föður-landið heldr hátt hafit upp úr sjónum, Eggert.
Nes-konungr, a pr. name, Baut. 402.
nett-leikr, m. neatness, (mod.)
njótr, m., add,—njóts-minni, n. [still in Norway called ujös-minne, var Aasen, in the new Edition of his Dict., of a cup drunk by customers after striking a bargain]:—a kind of 'earnest-cup'; sendi hann honum ína skál fulla mjaðar, ok bað hann drekka njótsminni (mótsminni is an error), hér með, segir konungr, vil ek gefa þér, Sveinn, jarlsnafn, etc., ms. vi. 52: the suggestion at the end of the article is therefore true.
Noregr, add,—'Nurviag' on the Jellinge stone.
nótt, f., C, add,—nætr-gölttr, n. a roving about by night.
ný-lýsi, n., to the passage Orkn. 420 add,—According to the Saga and an entry in the old Annals the day in question was the evening of the 21st of Dec. 1154, old style; and from information given by Mr. Main (the Radclyffe Observer, Oxford), a full moon fell on this very day in that year, old style. This quite settles the question as to the true old sense of ný and nýlýsi. The chronology of Torfaeus in the old Ed. of Orkn. S. is altogether wrong.
nýting, f. a term of husbandry; góð, ill nýting, of getting in the hay or crop, Esp. 1761.
næðingr, m. a cilly blast, = gnæðingr, (mod.)
nær-fellr, n. adj. as adv. nearly, almost, (mod.)
nökkor, adv., qs. ne-hvar or ne-veit-hvar, somewhere, very freq. in old writers, somewhere, anywhere; to this word belong the references under nekkverr, B. IV. 3, p. 452; to which add,—hér nökkur, Fb. i. 73; nökkur ands eða lagar, Al. 107. In mod. usage this word has become obsolete and is replaced by einhvers-staðar; the explanation given under nekkverr, B. IV. 3, must be altered accordingly, and the words 'somevat, may be' struck out.
nökkvi, a, m.; in the phrase, þungr sem 'nökkvi', or nökkva-þungr, of things like hay soaked with water or the like. This word can hardly be related to nökkvi, a boat; we think it is qs. n-ökkvi, cp. ökkur and kvast, 'þungr sem einn ökvi' rapidly pronounced sem 'nökkvi, the n being taken from the preceding word, as in njóli (jóll, p. 326, col. 2).

ofan, adv.; instead of 'in þíðr, S. often spelt oman,' read 'the mod. Faroese dialect has oman.'

of-stærð, f. = ofsteri, Thom. 411.
of-vægi, n. an enormity, an enormous weight.
opt, add,—with the notion of ever; úrliga verða skyli maðr opt fá, Hm.; so opt, ósjaldan, Vsp.
örð, n., add the phrase,—fú sér e-ð til örða, to notice, to resent; eg vil ekki fá mér það til örða, Vidal. ii. 41; among compounds, add,—örð-fyndni, f. facetiousness; örð-heppinn, adj. biting; örð-hof, n. the word-sanctuary, i. e. the mouth, Stor.; örð-lagðr, part. famous; örð-lenkja, d, to dilate upon; eg vil ekki ó þetta, I will cut it short; örð-reyrr, m. the word-reed, i. e. the tongue, Sighvat: örð-ræmðr, part. notorious; örð-stafir, m. pl. 'word-staves,' phrases, Am. 9; örð-svif, n. pl. rumours, Post. 92.
ostr,—the etymology of ostr, qs. jostir, is confirmed by the borrowed Finnish justo, see Dr. W. Thomsen, p. 66.
óðal, instead of B. II. 3, read,—In the old Norse there is a compd alda-óðal, a property of ages or beld for ages or generations, Lat. fundus avitus, an ancient allodial inheritance; ok ef eigi er leyst innan þriggja vetra, þá verðr sú jörð honum at alda óðali, and if it be not released within three years, then the estate becomes his allodial property, D. N. i. 129; til æfnlegrar eignar ok alda óðals, for everlasting possession and allodial tenure, iii. 88: then this phrase became metaphorical, in the phrase, at alda óðli, to everlasting possession, i. e. for ever; Jóann prestur skal vera þar meðan hann vill ok fylgja því at alda eyðli, i. 266; hverr verðr þykki at taka þann úmaga at alda óðli, to maintain him (the poor man) for ever, Grág. i. 264; or of past time, frá alda óðli, from time immemorial; varla hefir þvílíkt heyrzt frá aldaöldi, Vidal. ii. 181; whence the mod. Dan. frá 'arilds' tid (by corrupt pronunciation = fra 'ald-odels' tid, ld being changed into r). We believe the mid. Lat. all-odium to be derived from this compd, by way of assimilation; the old Teut. form would be alp-odal (Goth. all- = ævum), whence all-odal, allodium, property held in absolute possession, opposed to such as is held in fee or subject to certain conditions. The remarks under óðal, l. 7, 'from this word, etc.' should be modified accordingly.
óð-gjörð, f. verse-making, panegyric, eulogy, Post. 510.

 sand-yrja, u, f. a quicksand, Safn i. 78.
 sannr, adj. sooth, add.—Lat. -sons, -sonis, is the same word; the old Norse law term, sannr at sök, or ú-sannr, eigi sannr at sök, exactly answers to the Lat. law term 'in-sons,' thus Lat. injuriae insous is literally rendered in Icel. by 'ú-sannr at sök.'
 satt-na = satt, true, Bs. i. 469, v. l.
 sár = sá, demonst. pron., is of frequent occurrence on Runic stones, e. g. sár eigi flo, be flew not; sár vann Nurviag at kristnu, be won Norway to Christianity; this 'sár' is simply a nominative case formed like öngur, margr, from einngi, manngi.

 sjá, the verb, l. 3, add.—pl. só, Clem.
 sjá, the pronoun, see sá, sú. This word or form might have been put under a separate head, it is often used in a pointedly demonstr. sense, like þessi; see the references s. v. sá.
 sjónhverfis-hringr, m. = sjóndeildar-hringr, Vidal. i. 206.
 sjór, B, add.—sjó-bliða, u, f. a sea-calm, Post. 48: sjó-volk, n. a tossing about, fatigue on the sea.
 skakk-ylgðr, part. threatening, of the waves, Egilsson's Poems.
 skalli, a, m., add.—skalli, kom þú á morgin, Post. 250.
 skapt-hár, observe,—we suspect that in the phrase 'skapthá söl,' of the sun just after sunrise, is concealed another sense; it is not 'spear-high,' but akin to A. S. scæft-mond = half a foot, or six inches, meaning the moment when the sun has got just half a foot above the hills; the definition given by the ancients themselves in K. þ. K. 96 is artificial and can hardly be etymologically true; the word was perhaps borrowed from the A. S., and so the old Icelanders themselves did not quite understand it; cp. the phrase, ganga skapta-muninn, to walk just half a pace, Lv. 35 (see skapt i. 2. at the end).
 skata, u, f., add the saying,—þegir barnið meðan það étr skötu-fötum.

 skinnn, n., add the naut. phrase,—leidd eigi lengi áðr skinna-köst fóru að koma á sjóinn, till the sea began to be lashed, of gusts or squalls of wind lashing the sea before a gale; the metaphor is from the game of skinn-leikr, Ísl. Þjóðs. ii. 129.

 skjall-hvítr, adj. white as skjall, q. v. skjarr-sýnn, adj. quick-eyed, Post. 636, v. l.
 skjár, m., observe,—skjár is prop. the bladder stretched on frames and used for glass, as still used in Norway, thus skjaa-lykta = a lantern of bladder, opp. to a glass-lantern; in Icel. the word has since come to mean the window or opening; whilst the bladder itself is called líkna-belgr.
 skjól-staðingr, m. a client, (mod.)
 skol-brúnn, the best Engl. rendering would be olive, of complexion.

 þrymr, m., add.—in the old lay, Em. 2, for hvat þrymr þar, we read, hvat þrym (dat.) er þar, what art thou there? The lost velhum, we suppose, had 'hvat þrym' þar, where ' might be the inflexive -r, but was meant to be the personal verb 'er,' often written in this abbreviated form above the line; þruma or þrymja, = tonare, is never found in old prose writers or poets; the conclusive reason is that the true idiomatic construction in this case is 'hvat' with a dative, and not with a verb (cp. hvat er þat hlym hlymja, Skm.)

Á meðan vakti Hildir ok Jós mungáti í eldara, ok kvad 'Hjorleif þat verri,' hún leysti hann svá at hún hjó með sverði skó-þvengina (thus, we believe, to be emended for 'ok kvad Hjorleif þar vera,' etc., of the vellum), king H. was bung up in the king's hall by his shoe-thongs between two fires . . . In the meantime H. kept awake, and poured ale into the fires, saying that this was worse (more tantalizing) for him; she then released him by cutting the thongs with a sword, Fas. ii. 34.

A LIST OF BRITISH RIVERS,

About a hundred in number, contained in old Icelandic alliterative memorial verses (inscribed á-heiti, i. e. names of rivers) from MSS. of the Snorra-Edda (ii. 479, 480, of the 13th century; the verses themselves may well be of the 12th century). Most of these rivers seem to belong to the northern Scottish counties, Caithness, Ross, Moray, Sutherland, and to the north-east of England. As specimens of an attempt at identification we add about thirty names, half for Scotland and half for England, leaving the rest open. In Scotland, Örmt, Armet W.; Sekin, Shin R.; Dyrn, Durn W.; Mein, Mein W.; Skialg, Shallag W.; Nis, Ness R.; Ekla or Ekkjall, Oykill R.; Spæ, Spey R.; Nið, Nith R.; Þöll, Thuil R.; Dyna, Don R.; Njörn, Nairn R.; Bro, Brova R.; Maura, Strath More; Aparðion, Aberdeen (here used of the river). In England, Tems, Thames R.; Humra, Humber R.; Dun, Don R.; Alin, Alne R.; Svöl, Swale R.; Usa, Ouse R.; Þyn, Tyne R.; Tvedda, Tweed R.; Lodda, Ludd R.; Ver, Wear R.; Ruðr, Rother R.; Ró, Rye R.; Hrið, Reed R.; Myn, Maun R.; Mynt, Mint R. (Johnston). A few (ten or twelve) of the rivers in the verses are of other countries, being probably added for alliteration sake, e. g. Jordan, Tiber, Euphrates, Albis, Loire; these we have omitted. Some of these names also occur in old lays (Gm., Bm., Gs., Hkv.), and this list may thus afford a hint as to the age of these poems.

GAELIC NAMES AND NICKNAMES

Contained in the Landnáma-bók (Icelandic Book of Settlement); those in the Orkn. and the Njála are left out, as being already well known. The translation and identification we leave to Celtic scholars, only noticing that these names, as well as those of the rivers above, were taken from oral tradition, not from books; the Norse form may therefore throw some light on the Celtic pronunciation of the 10th to the 12th centuries.
